funds are absolutely useless for the purpose of education, and the money is being wasted. I know, from my own experience, that in some parts of the country old grammar schools have been revived and put under new schemes, with the result that they are doing exceedingly well. In Wales the power of approaching the body who have the granting of new schemes—the Charity Commission—was placed in the hands of the secondary education bodies, and I am told that in Wales, owing to their influence in the localities, those bodies have been in many instances successful in getting old grammar schools put on a better footing and in utilising their endowments for the public good. If that is so I consider this is a matter of very great importance, and I regret that the noble Duke has not included some such provision in this Bill. On two points explanation is necessary to satisfy the fears of some highly intelligent persons outside Parliament, who are not, perhaps, so versed in dealing with Bills as members of your Lordships' House, and who have read the clauses of the Bill as enabling the authorities under it to make grants to any other form of education. That expression appears at the end of the first section of Clause 1, and it appears again at the end of the first section of Clause 2. An idea has been created that this might place primary education under the control of local councils. I confess myself that I do not share that idea, because the clauses are governed by the title of the Bill, which declares the Act to be—

If it were intended that the Bill should go to Committee, I should move that these words be added to the first sub-section of Clauses 1 and 2 in order to make this point clear. The noble Duke will no doubt be able to say something which will explain how this matter stands, for the benefit of those who are exceedingly anxious about it outside Parliament. Another matter I press upon the noble Duke is that he should not hastily draw a line of demarcation between secondary and primary schools. I quite agree with the noble Duke that there is very considerable difficulty in so doing, and I rejoice to see that he is not, at all events, in a hurry to draw that line. I think it would be a very great loss to education if the line were so drawn as to take the higher grade schools away from the management of the school boards. I am aware that the noble Duke has issued an Order regulating what are to be the higher grade schools still remaining under the Board of Education, but I am afraid, from what I hear, that the Order will throw a good many schools into very great difficulty, cause great dissatisfaction, and stop their admirable educational work in many parts of the country. I believe that these higher grade schools have become almost a necessity in many places. I will quote the opinion of a gentleman who was very well known to the noble Duke and myself when we were both at Cambridge—the late Chief Inspector of the Education Board, Mr. Sharpe. In his general Report for 1897 Mr. Sharpe said—

“But if a good system of secondary schools should in the distant future be established, I do not think that even then a hard-and-fast line can be drawn between primary and secondary schools, and there must be of necessity some overlapping of subjects; it would be unjust to deprive the higher primary schools of the liberty of taking some part of the subjects which might be held to belong to secondary schools. Unless a system of County Council or other scholarships can be devised, which would remove all the more clever boys to a secondary school at an age that would leave three or four years of subsequent study, boys who have only two years longer of school life would be better left in the higher primary school, with whose methods and teachers they are familiar.”

I think these are very wise words, and I venture again to press on the noble Duke that he should not be in too great a hurry to draw this line of demarcation, though at some future day it will have to be drawn. I am afraid I have detained your Lordships at considerable length, but my excuse must be the great importance of the subject. It is one in which the country takes the deepest possible interest. In my opinion this Bill is hardly adequate, and in some respects I am afraid it opens dangerous topics. If I am mistaken in this I shall be glad, for I am certain that the sooner a sound, good system of secondary education in the country is established, the better. We talk a great deal of the absolute necessity, in these days of keen competition in commerce with other nations, of giving a wide and good technical education, but I venture to say that we must include secondary with technical education, for without a good grounding in secondary education it is vain and futile to impart technical instruction to pupils.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I think it is quite true that the proposals in the first clause of the Bill are too vague, and that we ought to have a more distinct statement of the principle on which these educational committees are to be formed. It is a very marked thing, and I do not think it is a right thing, that for the first time in legislation of this sort, so far as I can remember, these schemes are not to be submitted to Parliament. Parliamentary control over them is altogether gone. Hitherto it has been the practice, when schemes are made for endowed schools, for instance, that every such scheme should be submitted to Parliament and discussed either in this House or in the other House. I think it is rather a misfortune that Parliament is not called upon in the same way to deal with such schemes as are proposed under Clause 1 of this Bill, because there can be no question at all that the discussions in Parliament have a great effect not only upon the scheme under discussion, but upon the general course of public opinion on these matters. As to the proposals with regard to religious education, the noble Earl seems to think that denominational religious education is something bad in itself.

EARL SPENCER: I do not think it is bad in its proper place.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I think it is a mistake to say it should not come within secondary education. That is the place where, indeed, it is most wanted. The experience of the working of schools since 1870 has very distinctly brought before us this fact, that the undenominational education given does not reach the religious instruction desired by religious people to be given. Those who are anxious that religious education should be given mean not only that the learners should be taught particular doctrines but that they should be trained to apply all religious doctrines to their ordinary life, and you do not get that training from any teacher who is not very much in earnest about the religious instruction which he gives. There are teachers, I have no doubt, who are very much in earnest and who would do good work of that kind, although restricted from handling the religious instruction which they give quite freely. I have no doubt there are such teachers, but they do not abound. As a rule, if you leave a man free he will teach such religious education as he himself believes in, and he will teach it tolerably well in proportion to that belief; but you will not get a man who is very much in earnest in these matters to give a thorough-going religious education if you say to him he must leave out a large part of that which, in his own eyes, is of very great importance as an ingredient in all such education. Denominational education has this merit about it, that it always tends to carry with it, not merely religious knowledge, but religious training in a sense in which I do not believe that you would get it from teachers who are hampered by the undenominational system. I do not mean to say that I have any fault to find with the undenominational system if you can get teachers who are really able to give true religious instruction under that form, but I do say that the number of teachers who can do it is extremely limited, and that whilst you can get a few to do it, and to do it well, you do not get a very great number. Therefore, I think that anything which damages denominational education in this part of the educational system would be a very serious mischief. I do not wish to find fault with the proposals that are in the Bill, but I should like, if possible, to secure for denominational teaching what was allowed by the Department a little while ago in a training college that was established for mistresses. In that case it was provided that the residential part of the training college should be denominational, but that it should have also a non-residential part, and there the conscience clause came in. There was a fair compromise between the two systems, and I think the application of that principle in the provision of schools for secondary education might very well be allowed, and would get rid of all the difficulty on this subject with greater ease than any other proposal that I have yet heard of. That in day schools there should be a conscience clause is fair enough. The teaching in day schools can be managed in such a way that the withdrawal of certain children is not a very serious difficulty; but when you come from day schools to boarding schools the thing is different, and I hold that, where these boarding-houses are in the hands of denominational managers, religious instruction should be given to all who are living within those houses. It would be a difficult thing to provide anything of this sort in elementary schools, because there, from the nature of the case, you have not got boarding-houses at all. But in secondary education it is certain that a very large proportion of the pupils will be living in boarding-houses, and to impose a conscience clause in such cases would be doing nobody any good whatever, but would impose on a good many a great burden, because it is so very difficult to manage a home in which you have different religious persuasions present. The students ought to be treated as if they were in their own homes. I venture to put this before the House and before the noble Duke, the Lord President, because it is consistent with the principle that has been already adopted, and will, I think, make a very great difference in the working of a Bill such as this. I should be very sorry if the result should be to bring denominational religious instruction into any place where it ought not to come, but I venture to think you ought to be very careful indeed before you decide that secondary education is such a thing that into the homes which I have described denominational religious education ought never to enter. Those are the only remarks I wish to make at this point on Clause 3; but I desire also to say a word with regard to Clause 4. In that clause it is stated that—

I think it would be a help to us all when this Bill reaches Committee if in the margin a reference was made to the places in those Acts where this power of establishing schools is given. The power of aiding schools is given plainly enough, but I have not been able to find where there is power given in the Technical Instruction Acts to establish schools. I think it would be as well that that matter should be cleared up. In conclusion, I wish to add that while I have not the slightest desire to prevent the Bill from becoming law, I think it comes twenty years too late.

The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

LORD REAY: My Lords, after the careful analysis of the Bill which has been made by my noble friend behind me, I do not intend to go into the details of the measure, but I wish to call the attention of the House to the general aspect of the question of secondary education. What is the great need of the country with regard to secondary education at the present time? The answer is, a proper distribution of the time which is available for education. The great danger at the present moment is the overloaded curriculum, because insufficient allowance is made for the great variety of existing demands. Where a boy's education ends at fifteen, it is quite clear that he will have to distribute his time differently than if he ends his education at eighteen; and the next question which arises is, what kind of education will be required in view of the profession or career on which the boy will enter? A sailor must have a different education from that of a soldier, and a doctor must have a different education from that of an engineer. We must therefore provide for two things, and keep them very distinct—general secondary education, and special secondary education, taking into account the leaving age and the profession on which the scholars intend to enter. I am very thankful that no attempt has been made in this Bill to draw the line of demarcation between primary, secondary, and higher education. It is a very remarkable fact that quite lately two very eminent statesmen in France—M^r. Poincaré and Bourgeois—in giving evidence before a Secondary Education Commission, both agreed that it was quite impossible to draw the line between primary, secondary, and higher education. That is all the more remarkable, because in the organisation of the French Ministry of Public Education there is a director for primary education, a director for secondary education, and a director for higher education. If, therefore, the demarcation has failed in France, we may conclude that we should not be more successful in a similar attempt. There are so many openings for English boys that we must necessarily have a great variety of curricula. However limited the time may be at the disposal of those who have to teach the boy, a sound general education must be given as a solid foundation. It is on that point that I wish to enter into some detail, because my impression is that the ideas of the Board of Education of what constitutes a general education are not very clear. The longer you can defer the period of specialisation the better. When I received the Minute on Higher Elementary Schools, I thought that these principles were recognised, and that it was intended to give a general education up to the age of fifteen—the limit of the Free Education Act—to all those who would be qualified and prepared to make good use of it. The Minute contemplated “suitability of instruction to the circumstances of the scholars and the neighbourhood.” That was exactly what was wanted, and it could not mean anything but a differentiation of the curricula of higher elementary schools. Under these circumstances the School Board for London asked for the recognition of forty-three separate schools for boys and girls in seventy-nine departments. That sounds a very large figure, but when I tell your Lordships that it only means one higher elementary school per 100,000 inhabitants, and that in the small kingdom of Saxony there are forty-four commercial schools, you will at once see that it was by no means an exaggerated demand. What was the answer of the Department? It was that—

“The Board of Education will be ready to entertain a proposal for the conversion of the schools of science provided by the school board, into higher elementary schools, and in localities where additional schools of science might, so far as educational reasons are concerned, be recognised, the Board of Education will consider an application for the recognition of a higher elementary school.”

The decision of the Board of Education is in direct contradiction with the words I have quoted from the Minute, for the simple reason that in London the education wanted by far the greater number of boys is not that of a school of science, and that as regards girls it is absolutely unsuitable. We have seventy-nine higher grade departments in connection with the London School Board, and only four schools of science. If the higher elementary school is to be a school for general education, it cannot be a school of science. Science may be one of the subjects taught, but it cannot be the preponderant element. In order to justify what I am saying, I shall appeal from the Board of Education to the late Education Department. On November 3rd, 1898, the Science and Art Department forwarded a suggestion by their Inspector that Chelsea “would benefit by the provision of a suitably equipped School of Science.” The Education Department, however, sent a Report from their Inspector strongly urging that the school should be designed “also for the teaching of modern languages and commercial training.” On March 2nd, 1899, the Education Department forwarded to us a further Memorandum from Her Majesty’s Inspector for the Chelsea Division, in which he alludes to “the lack of commercial training and utterly inadequate time given to the only modern language taken” in the higher grade schools in Chelsea. This led to a conference with representatives of the Education Department. Her Majesty’s Chief Inspector in his annual Report for 1899 refers to this conference as follows—

“There was general agreement that in these [higher grade] schools there is a tendency to neglect what may be called the humanities, and to make practical subjects unduly prominent. That this neglect of literary subjects is injudicious is shown by the instance of Scotland, where literary subjects have always been considered of first importance, and yet no one can accuse the Scotch of being imperfectly equipped for the practical work of their lives, or can deny their success in every branch of it—mechanical, commercial, or intellectual.”

It is not a Scotsman who says that, but Her Majesty’s Chief Inspector in London. A sub-committee of the Technical Education Board of the London County Council came to the same conclusion, after having instituted an inquiry into the needs of commercial education in London. They reported as follows—

“We are of opinion that it is a question which concerns the citizens of London more than any other British subjects, for London stands alone, as the greatest commercial centre in the world, and as the heart of the British Empire. London has not only a larger proportion of clerks than any other city in the world, it has probably also a larger proportion of clerks to the whole population than most other cities. Everything which affects British trade must affect London in a special degree; and it is only fitting that any measures which are to be taken for the defence of our commercial supremacy should be put forward in the first instance by the merchants and citizens of London.”

Therefore in the case of London there is a perfect agreement as to the necessities of general secondary education between Her Majesty’s Inspectors, the Technical Education Board, and the London School Board. But, though the London School Board, complying with the demand of the late Education Department, have established higher elementary schools for instruction in modern languages and commercial subjects, the present Board of Education have limited us to the development of a very scanty number conducted on pure science lines. I cannot understand the educational reason for this action on the part of the Board of Education. What the business houses in London want are clerks who can at least speak fluently one foreign language. If only you begin at an early age this is quite feasible, but this decision of the Board of Education upsets all the measures taken by the London School Board in compliance with the instructions of the Education Department. It does more. It throws the whole burden of our higher grade departments on the rates, in so far as the payment of a block grant constitutes a reduction on the grant we obtained for those schools under the former Code. It virtually cancels the Minute to which I have referred, and instead of giving us higher elementary schools, which we want, forces us to be satisfied with a ridiculously small number of schools, which are only required by a minority of the inhabitants of London. The case of London illustrates that of other centres similarly situated. It discloses, however, a very important misconception, to which the noble Earl behind me has already alluded, which may injuriously affect not only our higher elementary schools, but also our secondary schools. It proceeds from the same mistaken notion which turned technical education committees into secondary education committees under Clause 7 of the Directory of the Science and Art Department. The assumption that the literary side of elementary and of secondary education is less important than its scientific side, and that if you introduce a few literary subjects in a school of science you have satisfied educational demands, is entirely erroneous. It is the result of the neglect of scientific studies in former days and the monopoly enjoyed by classical studies. One side of secondary education is covered by classics. The question at once arises, how much benefit is derived from these studies? If they are pursued with the real aim to master the best thoughts of the Romans and Greeks as expressed in their language, no one will deny their educational value; but in how many instances is this the case? I asked a classical master this question, and he stated that out of every four classical scholars three derived absolutely no benefit from such training, and he was not prepared to grant that of the remaining fourth more than a small proportion were really the better for the time they had spent on Latin and Greek. What is the alternative? That the time wasted on Latin and Greek should be given to English literature and history. There is not to my mind a finer educational instrument than English literature, and that history should be studied in all its ramifications will, I think, need no argument in this House. The result will be that you will give a real education to the large majority of boys who at present get a mere superficial knowledge of the classics, and that they will have been taught subjects which they will assimilate, and which will stimulate them to further exertion. In both cases the education will proceed on literary lines, and in both cases you may add other subjects, but you will have brought these young minds in contact with the best thoughts of superior minds. The neglect of English literature and history may lead to this curious result, that an Englishman meeting a German may find that the latter knows more of English literature and of English history than he knows himself. This question of the relative value of a classical and a modern literary education has been most carefully investigated in France and in Germany. In a recent volume of evidence given before a commission of secondary education, presided over by M. Ribot, a former Premier, in France, such eminent witnesses as M. Poincaré and M. Bourgeois, ex-Ministers of Public Instruction, and M. Gréard and M. Lavirre, stated that modern literature should be placed on the same footing as the classics. The German Emperor put this very forcibly when he said—"I don't want Romans and Greeks; I want Germans." By far the greater number of professions on which young Englishmen enter require a knowledge of modern subjects. You want a general education on modern lines running parallel with a general education on classical lines, and you can include science in either. It would be disastrous to make classics the main feature of a literary education, and science the main feature of a modern education. Although I have laid great stress on the necessity for a general education because I consider that it is in danger of being overlooked, I am quite aware of the legitimate demand for special instruction, and of the wise impulse given to technical instruction by the noble Duke. We cannot sufficiently develop the higher branches of technical education. The country is, I believe, thoroughly alive to the fact that it has to meet the rivalry of other nations who are constantly adapting their education to ever-varying needs. It is a vital question for our industries and our trade, which depend upon the excellence of our secondary education. It is an Imperial question. What is wanted at the Education Office above all is "the open window," in order to see what is going on elsewhere. In Germany the Emperor is giving to the development of secondary education his constant attention. The expansion of German trade, of German industries, is directly due to the unremitting efforts of the German Government to improve their secondary education. And it is to the general, not to the special education, that their success is mainly due. In France we have the interesting Report of the Commission to which I have alluded. The Report and the evidence show a clear appreciation of all the difficulties of the problem and of the urgent need for reform. Your Lordships are aware of the results of American technological institutes, and how they affect the competition we have to meet. The battle of our trade, of our industries, has to be fought in our schools, in our workshops, and in our scientific laboratories. Will this Bill give us the institutions for general and special secondary education, and for the highest developments of technology? I doubt it. I trust that the Bill will be reintroduced on broader lines, and that it will secure to every part of the country, after a careful survey of the needs of every district—an omission in this Bill which seems to me inexplicable—at least as many opportunities for secondary education as Scotland, Wales, and some of our Colonies enjoy. Indeed, I cannot make out why the Board of Education is not more alive to the necessity of levelling up the English system of education towards that of Scotland. In the next edition of this Bill I hope to find the grants made dependent on approved schemes of general or special instruction; the formation of secondary education committees on lines thoroughly representative of all the educational interests concerned in the various localities; representation secured on the governing bodies of schools which receive public aid; provision for the better use of our educational endowments; the absorption of the educational duties exercised by the Charity Commissioners; the application of the science and art grants to the purposes of the Bill; provision for the training of secondary education teachers, especially in regard to foreign languages; and effect given—which, for some reason or other I cannot fathom, the Bill does not do—to the admirable recommendations of the Royal Commission on Secondary Education. I am deeply convinced that this question of secondary education is one of Imperial importance, a question which bears very closely on our position in the world, and I do not think that in this Bill, which merely touches the fringe of a great question, the Government give satisfaction to what the country asks for and to what the country needs in order to cope with the ever-increasing competition of foreign countries and their increasing efforts to satisfy the demand for improved education.

*THE LORD BISHOP OF HEREFORD: My Lords, after the various interesting speeches to which we have listened I am afraid the House may feel that the subject has been almost sufficiently discussed, and yet, having devoted a large portion of my life to secondary education, I desire to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I venture to make two or three observations upon the Bill. In the first place, like some of the speakers who have preceded me, I am bound to confess that I feel the Bill to be a somewhat disappointing one, because it is such a very little measure when the urgency of the occasion and the greatness of the subject and of our national needs are considered. Those of us who have occupied ourselves with secondary education have felt for the last thirty years or more how some of the Continental nations were forging ahead of us, and this fact has been brought home more forcibly by reason of the reports which have recently been presented. Whatever this Bill is called, we have to take it as all that Her Majesty's Government have to offer for the reorganisation of our secondary education system, and, like the noble Lord who has just sat down, I am bound to acknowledge that I cannot understand why the excellent Report of the Royal Commission has been to such a large extent ignored. Before I had the privilege of listening to the debates in this House I was under the impression that it was the habit to take account of the Reports of Royal Commissions, but in the few brief weeks during which I have been a Member of the House I think this is the third Commission's Report which I have seen almost entirely disregarded. When I look at this Bill I am disappointed, in the first place, by the omission of many things which all of us who have been working in secondary education had hoped to see included. Most of those omissions have been already alluded to, but I could not but feel, with the noble Lord, some surprise that nothing is said in this Bill of the use, or the better use, of our educational endowments, and that no sort of power is given to deal with these endowments. From my own practical observation I do not know how any educational committee is to deal thoroughly with this matter in rural or other districts without some such powers. Then again, I must confess a feeling of disappointment that nothing has been done to settle the relations between our elementary and secondary education. I do not mean that I should be prepared to delimit either one or the other, but it is impossible to deal with the practical work of education without feeling that one of the burning questions which must be settled before we can get rid of friction and make real progress is the relation of the higher grade schools to secondary education. But the great omission is the one which was referred to by the noble Lord who has just sat down—namely, that there seems to be no obligation laid on either the local authority or the Central Board even to inquire into the needs of any district. Surely the very first step to be taken, if we are to do any real service in this matter, is to find out the actual needs of this and that county throughout the country. Turning to the provisions of the Bill, I will confine my criticisms to two fundamental clauses. The first of these is Clause 1, the third section of which constitutes the county council the local authority. Here we have one element in the Bill which seems to me, so far as I can judge from my experience, to deserve our unqualified approval, inasmuch as it makes the county the administrative unit. I cannot, however, go along with the clause in handing over the whole of the administration of secondary education to the county councils themselves, subject only to the check of the Central Board. County councils are excellent bodies for many purposes, but I do not suppose they themselves would claim to be educational bodies. If the local authorities are the county councils pure and simple there will be all sorts of variations between one county and another, and I fear there may be some counties in which there will be very little educational work done. I cannot say from my experience, my Lords, that there is a great deal of zeal in the cause of education up and down our rural districts. A good many of our county councils are by no means anxious to spend public money to a large extent on educational work, and so far I cannot feel that they are the proper authorities to be left absolutely paramount and independent in the matter. Something like ten counties which have the administration of what is called the whisky money have not spent by any means the whole of that money on education; and I believe there are about half as many councils of county boroughs which have only spent part of the money on education. I am not blaming those bodies for exercising their legitimate rights, but I cannot but feel that this fact shows that county councils need leavening if we are to form the best sort of education committee for the purpose of this Bill. Therefore I must express my regret that in framing the clause the noble Duke did not take the recommendation of the Royal Commission and say that while the county council should have a bare majority on the education committee the rest should be so elected as to represent the various educational interests and to secure that there should be on every educational Committee men who are really in earnest about the progress of education and who have some real knowledge of the matter. At present, as I understand this clause, there is no sort of guarantee that the education committee of any particular county will have either any interest in, or any real knowledge of education. The only other clause to which I would refer is the one which was alluded to by his grace the Archbishop of Canterbury. Section 2 of Clause 3 is, as your Lordships are aware, an attempt to solve what is known as the religious difficulty, but I am bound to acknowledge that I do not think it is an attempt which is likely to be very successful. I have the deepest desire to see this religious difficulty got out of the arena of public discussion. I have felt for many years that it has been one of the greatest obstacles to our real educational progress, and now I fear that unless some better clause can be framed than the present one we may import the same difficulty into secondary education. The clause to which I am referring declares that :

"A council in the performance of their duties with respect to education shall not give any preference or advantage to any school on the ground that it does or does not belong to, or is or is not in connection with or under the management of any particular church, sect, or denomination, or that religious instruction is or is not given in the school. Provided that aid shall not be given under this Act to any school in respect of religious instruction."

Now, my Lords, what does that amount to? So far as I can understand the meaning of the clause, it simply amounts to a declaration by which you propose to earmark, so to speak, the aid that is given for this or that school. I am always a little shy of anything in the nature of earmarking in the giving of public grants, and this attempt to earmark aids as only for secular instruction, ignoring the whole question of religious instruction, will be absolutely futile. At any rate, if it is considered sufficient to declare that the public aid given to a public school is given solely for secular instruction, and if that is expected to satisfy public sentiment, I cannot but feel that it should be applied at once to elementary education also. If it is to satisfy public sentiment in regard to secondary education, why should we not be satisfied with it in regard to elementary education, and yet there is no one who will propose it as a settlement of the religious difficulty in our elementary schools. It may be asked, What have I to suggest in place of this? I suggest that the county council, or educational committee of the county council, shall have no power to aid any school on the management of which it is not adequately represented. That I hold to be a fundamental principle which we ought to endeavour to establish through the whole system of our education, and I believe it could be established both with regard to secondary and primary schools without any great amount of difficulty. Having granted this principle, that no aid shall be given to any school on which the county council or the local authority is not adequately represented, I would then be content to say that schools in connection with any particular church or sect or denomination shall be held to be suitable for those pupils who are likely to make use of them, provided, first, that due regard is had to the religious belief of the parents; secondly, that the educational needs of the neighbourhood are duly considered; and, thirdly, that due care is taken that the fees are suitable. I believe that then no further difficulty would be found. I wish to say one word with reference to the clause dealing with private schools under private management. Section 3 of Clause 3 provides that public aid may be given to a school conducted for private profit. I cannot but think that that is a proposal which will require to be carefully watched, to secure that public aid shall not go to increase the dividends of a company. I do not make this criticism as in any way opposed to private schools. My belief is that we should give every encouragement to private enterprise in education as in other matters. My experience has shown that in some cases the very best schools are private schools, and for the reason that a really good private school is generally under the guidance and inspiration of a remarkable man; but my feeling on the whole matter is that, if the private school cannot be so managed as to be on the whole self-supporting, it would be better, in the public interest, that the education should be taken over by the public. In conclusion, I would venture to appeal to the noble Duke to give us a more adequate Bill at the earliest possible opportunity. Having discussed this little Bill, and having decently buried it, I hope that before next session is very old the noble Duke will come forward with such a Bill as he himself would approve. I cannot suppose for a moment that this Bill satisfies the noble Duke. I have had many opportunities of feeling grateful to the noble Duke for the support and assistance he has given to educational matters. I cannot but express my profound conviction of the urgency of this question. We have been so busy during the last few years in opening up new markets, expanding our Empire, and taking possession of new territories, some of which, I fear, are likely to be hornets' nests, that we have, I am afraid, somewhat overlooked the plain fact—plain to everyone who studies the question—that prosperity in the future will be with the best educated people, and that, if we do not press the question of education more earnestly and more actively, one of the consequences of our extension of Empire will be that the main benefits will be enjoyed by those who belong to better educated countries. I therefore again express the hope that the noble Duke will bring forward a more adequate Bill on the earliest possible occasion next session.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, after the discussion which has taken place I will not trouble your lordships with many words, but will confine myself to one or two points. In the first place, I must say that I entirely share with the right rev. Prelate who has just sat down, regret that this is so small a measure; it is, in point of fact, very little more than a sketch of a measure which is to be filled in by the Education Department afterwards. I wish to say a word upon the very important question as to the authority which is to administer this Bill. I do not like, as it stands, the clause which deals with the local authorities which are to be set up. While I think it quite right that the county councils should be the bodies to whom this work should be entrusted, yet I agree with the right rev. Prelate that it is essential that there should be on the committees which are to manage the affairs of secondary education, men who are educational experts as well as common-sense business men. I should deprecate nothing more than that you should have a committee consisting solely of men of business, or solely of educational experts. Both elements are wanted, the one to correct the other, and I do not by any means give more weight to one than the other. You want common-sense business men, but you also want men who have had long experience of educational questions, for I do not know a subject on which it is more difficult to come to a perfectly clear and satisfactory conclusion. I feel, also, some jealousy of the very extended powers given to the Education Board. It seems to me that in cases where, after full discussion between the county council and the Education Board, no agreement can be come to, it is rather a doubtful matter—though I do not wish to commit myself absolutely to an opinion—that the Education Board should be able to deal with the question and promulgate a scheme without any power of correction by Parliament. I have watched educational discussions through many years, and I know that it is necessary to be extremely careful not to trust absolutely to the Government of the day the settlement of certain questions beyond appeal. You do want, as it were, some power to finally decide a dispute between the Government and the local authorities. It may be that that would be too cumbrous, but in principle I think it would be found to be sound. I feel very strongly with the right rev. Prelate that before a new educational authority is set up in any locality there should be a thorough examination of what the position in that part of the country is. Many of the grammar schools which have done good work in the past are now completely useless, and have ceased to be of any value, the only thing which perpetuates them being the village jealousy not to part with their grammar school. There should be some power to unite these very small schools with some larger school, and so render them more efficient. The mere fact that means of communication are now so much greater than they were has altered the whole aspect of the question. I deeply regret that after years of discussion we are about to take, as far as I can see, no effectual step to make use of the foundations we have already got. I must say a word upon what seems to me to be the most difficult question in this Bill—the question to which the right rev. Prelate referred at the close of his speech. I see in the provisions of this Bill, with the utmost dissatisfaction and even alarm, the repeal of the clause which was in the Technical Education Act giving complete protection to all those who went to denominational schools where the technical grant was applied to aid such schools. That is a step directly backward, a step in the teeth of the old policy of what was called the Cowper-Temple Clause. I feel the deepest distrust of those opposite to whom I sit on this question, and I see in this an attempt to bring again into discussion the point whether the rates of the country are to be applied, directly or indirectly, to the support of denominational schools, a point on which we know that a strong and bitter feeling exists on both sides. I am not one of those who think that, in the present condition of opinion in the country, we could dispense with denominational schools. Personally, I should like to see them all disappear to-morrow; but, looking at it as a practical man, I must say that that would be a measure fully unjustifiable in the present state of opinion in the country. Many of the denominational schools are excellent educational establishments, and we have to take care that we do not interfere with them in such a way as to destroy their efficiency. I admit that they must take a place in our system, and therefore it is our duty to make them efficient. To stir up this controversy in such a way as to raise a debate on the religious question throughout the country may be useful or not, but it certainly will not tend to the promotion of the object we all have in view—namely, the establishment of an efficient system of secondary education throughout the country. I will put aside the clause which is now about to be repealed, and ask your Lordships whether you have ever considered what the clause is which is in the Welsh Intermediate Education Act. In that Act, which was brought in by the members of the party opposite, what was by no means an unreasonable compromise was adopted. It will be found in the third section of Clause 4 of that Act. It does not interfere with the religious education of boarders in schools, and I do not think you could with propriety interfere in that way with these secondary education schools, many of which are closely connected with some denomination, and where it would be almost impossible to carry on the education as before if you applied a stringent clause to boarders. What the Welsh Intermediate Education Act did was this. It said that “such scheme shall, in addition to the—”

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: Read the beginning of the section.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I will read the whole of it. The section is as follows:—

“Where a scheme under this Act does not relate to a school maintained out of the endowment, or forming part of the foundation, of any cathedral or collegiate church, or where a scheme under this Act does not relate to any other educational endowment which by Section 19 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, is excepted from the foregoing provisions of that Act therein mentioned.”—

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: That is, all the denominational schools.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Not quite, I think.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: Yes.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Then I will give up that argument, which is merely an argument ad hominem, and apply myself to the remainder of the section, which, to my mind, suggests a very reasonable solution of the difficulty. The section continues—

“—such scheme shall, in addition to the provisions of Section 15 of the said Act, provide that no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught to a scholar attending as a day scholar at the school established or regulated by the scheme, and that the times for prayer or religious worship, or for any lesson or series of lessons on a religious subject, shall be conveniently arranged for the purpose of allowing the withdrawal of a day scholar therefrom in accordance with the said Section 15.”

I do not think that would be by any means an unreasonable provision—namely, to exempt the day scholars from any interference as regards religious instruction, leaving the boarders to be under the provisions of the scheme which was in force for the management of the school before it was taken over under the present Act. I think that would very likely be acceptable; but in any case I am perfectly sure there must be some kind of compromise if you are to go forward at all. I quite admit the strength of the feeling concerning denominational schools, and I take account of it, but I say you are going backward in this Bill, you are striking out provisions of the Technical Education Act of 1899, and I am not the only person who sees beneath the surface of this Bill a deliberate attempt to pave the way for dealing in a similar manner with elementary education, and, any such attempt will meet with strenuous resistance from the Party to which I belong. Throw down this apple of discord before the country, and you will find there are plenty of people willing to take it up in a manner which would greatly obstruct and hinder the operation of the Bill now before us, which, though a small Bill, may lay the foundation of a larger and wider scheme.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Duke of DEVONSHIRE): My Lords, I have no right to complain that this discussion has turned upon a very large number of questions, most of which are questions of detail, because I quite admit what has been said by several noble Lords that this Bill is by no means a large one; that it does very little but extend to a certain degree institutions and provisions which already exist, and cannot be regarded as more than a step—an additional step—in the direction of the organisation of secondary education. But the course which the discussion has necessarily taken has had the effect of raising such a very large number of questions of detail, some of them I think rather small details, that I am afraid it will be quite impossible—within any limits which I dare inflict upon your Lordships—to deal with very many of those points which have been raised. My noble friend who began the discussion was very much alarmed that this Bill contemplates the introduction of free secondary as well as elementary education. I do not know where my noble friend finds that in the Bill. He complains that it does not contain any mention of fees to be paid by those who are to receive the education in those schools receiving public aid, but if my noble friend will consider what are the resources at the disposal of the local authorities I think he will see that it is quite impossible that they will be sufficient to meet the cost of any secondary education without considerable assistance in the shape of fees from those who receive it. Those resources are limited to what is sometimes called the drink money, sometimes the whisky money, but what I think I have generally called the local taxation money. That is a considerable but not a very large sum. In addition to that the new authorities will have the disposal of a rate not to exceed 2d. in the pound; and in addition they will have the advantage of endowments of such schools as choose voluntarily to come within their educational schemes. Those resources are not so magnificent as to justify my noble friend in being in the least afraid that any proposal is made under this Bill which will be in the nature of free secondary education. Both my noble friend opposite (Earl Spencer) and the most rev. Prelate who spoke lately complained that this was a very small Bill, and the most rev. Prelate complained that the recommendations of the Report of the Commission had been entirely neglected. My Lords, I have admitted that this neither is nor professes to be a large Bill, but I cannot admit that the recommendations of the Royal Commission have been entirely neglected. I do admit that the Bill does not deal with all the matters which the Secondary Education Commission included in its full and exhaustive Report, but the proposals contained in this Bill are the very steps which were recommended by the Royal Commission, and are in my opinion the necessary preliminary steps to going any further in the direction of carrying out the recommendations of the Secondary Education Commission. The most rev. Prelate and Lord Spencer, and just now Lord Kimberley, complained that the Bill contains no power which will enable the new authorities to deal with educational endowments within their areas. I was under the impression that, under first the Secondary Education Commissioners and then under the Charity Commissioners, a very large number of the educational endowments of the country had already been dealt with.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: By new schemes, yes.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: By new schemes, and I cannot imagine anything which is more likely to stimulate action in the same direction, dealing with remaining endowments which have not yet been dealt with, than the constitution in every locality of an educational authority charged with the duty of providing secondary education within their area. But, my Lords, it seems to me, knowing the extreme jealousy with which any interference with local endowments of this kind is met, that we should not have been justified in attempting in this Bill, the main object of which is to create a new educational authority, to enlarge and make of a far more drastic character those powers which the Charity Commissioners have already felt considerable difficulty in exercising with success. It was suggested that these authorities would have no power even to make inquiry as to the educational provision within their areas. That is entirely a misconception, because these authorities will have power to make all the enquiries which they may think necessary in order to enable them to carry out their duties. Then, my Lords, exception has been taken to the vague manner in which the constitution of the educational authority is provided for, and to the large powers which are reserved to the Board of Education. After a great deal of consideration we came to the conclusion that the difficulties of dealing with the constitution of these authorities in any other manner were almost insuperable. In introducing this Bill I called attention to the fact that the circumstances of different parts of this country differ so much that it is almost impossible to lay down within the limits of a clause the principle upon which these committees should be constituted. It has been admitted, I think, in the discussion to-night that the constitution of a committee must differ in a county from the constitution of that which will be formed in a county borough—that there is an enormous difference between the circumstances of one county and another. One county is mainly agricultural, with one or two large towns in its centre. Other counties are almost entirely consisting of large towns. I only wish that in the interval between this and the next session my noble friends opposite and the most rev. Primate who took exception to the vagueness of this clause will exercise their ingenuity and see whether it is possible for them to draft a clause providing for the constitution of an authority which will not be vehemently resisted by some interest which may consider itself to be ignored or neglected or badly treated. The initiative in framing these schemes will proceed from the county council or the county borough council, but on the Board of Education the responsibility will rest to see that those schemes make proper provision for the adequate representation of interests, educational or otherwise, which, in our judgment, ought to be represented on such a body. Lord Spencer, I think, used the word co-optation. It would be entirely a mistake to suppose that we intended to rely upon co-optation only for the proper constitution of these bodies. The scheme will have to provide, in addition to the appointment of a certain proportion of councillors, for the nomination upon the body of such educational institutions or such non-county boroughs or such districts as upon inquiry we think ought to be represented, and while I am extremely sorry that it should have been found necessary to cast so heavy a responsibility upon the Board of Education, I do not believe that there is any other way in which it would be possible to arrive at a satisfactory mode of their appointment. It was suggested by the most rev. Prelate that there was no power of interference by Parliament with these schemes. Well, I do not see that it would be impossible to provide that these schemes should be laid before both Houses of Parliament, but I admit that I think such a course would probably be attended with very great practical inconvenience. Imagine schemes laid upon the Tables of both Houses providing for the constitution of educational committees for all the counties in England, for all the county boroughs in England, and conceive the opportunities which would be given to every county, every borough, every urban district, every educational authority, which did not consider that it had received sufficient recognition, to bring through their representatives their grievances before one or the other House of Parliament. I am afraid that if this course were adopted the time of both Houses of Parliament would for some time after the passing of this Act be chiefly occupied in the discussion of these questions.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If the noble Duke will pardon my interrupting him for one moment, I should like to hear his answer to a question which I am afraid I did not express very clearly. I only suggested that where the Education Department and the County Council could not agree, then perhaps there might be an appeal; which, of course, would not involve all the cases.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: I was not dealing with that. I was answering the most rev. Prelate the Archbishop of Canterbury, who suggested that the whole of the schemes ought to be laid before Parliament. It seems to me that the suggestion of the noble Earl opposite in those cases, which no doubt will be extremely exceptional, is one which will be well worthy of consideration.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I go no further than that.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: Now, my Lords, I feel a great deal of difficulty in addressing a very few words to your Lordships upon a subject which unfortunately is almost always introduced into these education discussions, namely, the denominational question. The noble Earl who spoke last said that this was distinctly a retrograde proposal. I think if he will examine the facts he will see that in one sense at all events his own proposal is a retrograde one. He recommended the adoption for day scholars of a universal Cowper-Temple clause. Well, such a provision would exclude the receipt of aid from the county authorities by institutions which are receiving it at present. The noble Earl regrets the disappearance of a certain section of the Technical Instruction Act, but if the noble Earl will refer to a Return which has recently been laid on the Table of the House showing the manner in which local authorities are applying their funds to the purpose of technical education, that Return shows that institutions of a most strictly denominational character are in fact aided out of the rates. Among the institutions so aided are, at Liverpool the St. Francis Xavier's College, the Catholic Institute, the Convent of Notre Dame at Everton, the Convent of Notre Dame at Mount Pleasant, and the Catholic Male Pupil Teachers' Class.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: That is what we object to.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: Is it supposed that institutions of that character would accept a universally applied Cowper-Temple Clause?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Do they receive it from the rates, or only from the whisky money?

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: This is a Return showing the application of the

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Including the penny rate?

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: Yes. Therefore the principle of my noble friend may be a very right and very excellent one, but certainly in regard to liberality of treatment in denominational schools it is a retrograde one. On the other hand, I understand the most rev. Prelate to object to the provision of a conscience clause in the case of boarding schools. Well, I cannot help thinking that the most rev. Prelate is rather unreasonable in making this demand. He refers to the case of a training college which was recently sanctioned by the Board of Education where, although they were permitted to be without a conscience clause as regards boarders, they were recognised on the condition of making certain provision for day scholars under a conscience clause. In my opinion the case of a training college is altogether distinct from that of such secondary schools as would be aided under this Bill. A denominational training college is maintained by the denomination to which it belongs for the education of the teachers who are to be employed in their own schools. They do not wish—naturally they do not wish—to admit to the college any others but teachers of their own denomination. That is the object for which the training college is established. But no such exclusion prevails in the case of our great secondary schools. I believe that in the case of Eton and Harrow and our other great public schools Roman Catholics, Nonconformists, and Jews are admitted to those schools, and no difficulty is found in the management of Eton and Harrow and other public schools in making provision for absolutely respecting the consciences of those boys of other denominations, while not interfering in the least degree with their own freedom in religious instruction as regards those of their own denomination. And I do not see why it should be considered any hardship in the case of schools desiring to come under educational schemes supported and aided by the county councils, to impose upon them conditions which in practice are not found difficult of observance in such schools as Eton and Harrow. My Lords, no doubt this question will be debated at very great length and with some warmth in the country. I cannot help, however, expressing my own belief that any such provision as has been suggested by the noble Earl opposite, that is to say the imposition of a Cowper-Temple Clause upon any school desiring to receive aid from this scheme, would exclude from co-operation a very large number of admirable denominational schools, the services of which the educational authority will probably be most anxious to obtain, and that therefore we should be for perfectly unnecessary reasons excluding ourselves from one of the best and most fruitful sources of educational supply. My noble friend Lord Reay made a speech in which I am afraid it is quite impossible for me on the present occasion to follow him. The substance of that speech was to invite me to give a reply to a very long letter on a very important subject which had been addressed by the London School Board to the Board of Education. That letter I had not seen until by the courtesy of the noble Lord I received notice of the question which he proposed to raise upon this occasion. Of course I have not yet had the opportunity of consulting my advisers in the Education Board, and the subject is one of much too great importance to make it possible for me to give an answer either to the noble Lord's speech or to that letter without a great deal of further consideration. The working, the administration, of the new higher elementary school grant is a matter of very great importance, and probably will be one of very considerable difficulty, and I think it would be extremely undesirable that on an occasion of this kind I should commit myself prematurely either in support or in rejection of the views which have been urged upon us by the London School Board. On the denominational question perhaps I ought to add that while I consider the objection of the most rev. Prelate to the conscience clause to be somewhat unreasonable, and one which I do not think can be entertained, while I believe that the suggestion of the noble Earl opposite would most unfortunately limit the educational resources to which it would be in our power to look, I must leave to both the noble Earl opposite and the most rev. Prelate the duty of determining whether the solution of this difficult question which was proposed by the Bishop of Hereford will meet the views of either of them. I am afraid that there are a very large number of excellent denominational schools which would resent a legislative provision which would compel them to accept the representation of a public authority upon their governing body, although I have no doubt that it will not be difficulty in the great majority of cases to make voluntary arrangements with the council by which the educational authority will be represented on such governing bodies. On the other hand, I doubt very much whether the anti-denominational friends of the noble Earl opposite would be satisfied with merely that provision enabling the county authority to aid whatever denominational schools it chose, provided they had representation upon the governing body. I am afraid, my Lords, that this is a subject which is a great deal too difficult, and which has in times past aroused too much controversy, to make it capable of very easy solution in any of the ways which have been suggested to-night. The Government have produced what they thought to be a reasonable solution, and I hope that when it comes to be further considered it will not meet with the embittered opposition of which I have heard for the first time from the noble Earl opposite to-night.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly.

INDIAN FAMINE IRRIGATION WORKS.

*LORD KINNAIRD: My Lords, in rising to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will give a list of the irrigation and other works for the prevention of famine undertaken since the last famine in 1897, and the cost thereof; also of the large works approved as being necessary previous to 1897 which have not been undertaken owing to want of surplus revenue, notwithstanding the fact that they are expected to be remunerative, and that money can be borrowed at a lower rate than works are expected to yield, I think everyone may feel hopeful that we are now near the time when the pressure of famine will begin to pass, and the Government will be free to consider what steps may be taken to prevent future famine in certain districts unprovided with water. I will not enter at this time into the thorny questions on which there is so much difference of opinion with reference to what can be done and whether we fail to utilise the water which Providence gives to us, and of which I believe more than three-fourths if not a great deal more, is not utilised, and whether large works might be carried on with any advantage, as has been done in some districts where certain authorities in old times said it was impossible to take advantage of water not far off by means either of irrigation canals or the storage of water by means of dams. Then the second part of my question raises, I think, an important point, namely, whether it is desirable to stop an important work simply because revenue may fail when it has been agreed by all the authorities that the work is desirable. It seems to some laymen in this matter, that when the Government can borrow at a low rate of interest and hope within a short time not only for a return on the work but also increase of revenue, when the next revenue assessment comes to be made the work ought not to be stopped by want of ready money, and I feel confident that there are many in both Houses of Parliament who would be willing, supposing the Indian Government were not able to further their own resources, to find large sums for this purpose to make even a liberal grant from the Imperial Exchequer in the way of a free loan, with proper conditions for repayment when the work became remunerative. I will not further detain your Lordships. I have to ask the noble Lord the question of which I have given notice.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of ONSLOW): I think from the nature of the question which the noble Lord has put to me that he has not quite rightly appreciated the practice of the Government of India in apportioning the money for the purpose of carrying out irrigation. There are three kinds of irrigation works carried out by the Government of India. First of all, there are what are known as the major works. Those are paid for out of borrowed moneys and are expected to be, and as a matter of fact are, remunerative. Then there are what are known as minor works. Those as a rule are smaller works which are constructed not out of capital, but out of revenue. In some cases those also are remunerative. Then there are what are known as protective works. These are paid for out of the famine fund, which, as the noble Lord knows, is a fund set apart every year by the Government of India for the purpose of protection against famine. They would not be constructed at all were it not for protective purposes, although it occasionally turns out that they also are remunerative. Of all those works, if the noble Lord wishes it, I can give a return, but they can already be found in different papers which have been laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament. As regards the second part of the question the noble Lord seems to think that some of the irrigation works in India are likely to be suspended owing to lack of funds arising from revenue; but, as I have already told him the major works, the more important works, are paid for out of borrowed money and not out of revenue at all, and I am not at all aware that there is any ground for the suggestion which seems to be contained in the question that the expenditure on irrigation works has been cut down during recent years owing to the famine. On the contrary, the provision for irrigation works has been steadily increasing in recent years. In 1898-99, the total expenditure was £453,047, in 1899-1900 it was £622,733, while the Budget estimate for the current year is £708,200. A paper has been laid on the Table of your Lordships' House called "The Explanatory Memorandum of the Secretary of State," explanatory of the Budget statement which he will make in another place in the course of a few days, and the noble Lord will there find a statement of the irrigation works which are about to be carried out. But I think there is a little misapprehension in the minds of many people as to the amount of the irrigation work which is being carried on. Not less than nineteen millions of acres are already under irrigation in India and twenty-five and a half millions of money have been spent, and as a matter of fact there is very little fresh ground in the whole of India where irrigation works could be constructed with any advantage. The Viceroy has been giving great attention to this question and he has come to the conclusion that all that the Government of India could spend, however much money they might have, would be something like ten lakhs a year, and that would probably about double the area of 300,000 acres which is covered by work of a purely protective character at the present time. So the total practicable increase of the irrigable area in India under both heads of irrigation works cannot amount to much more than four million acres. The Viceroy hopes to lay down a permanent scheme and a continuous policy for carrying out irrigation works in India, and so far as the cost and the money to be raised for carrying them out is concerned, I think the noble Lord need have no apprehension that that amount will fall off in years to come, because, as he is well aware, the major works—most of the irrigation works in India—are extremely remunerative and therefore capital can be advantageously borrowed for the purpose of making them, and it is the intention of the Government of India to continue carrying them on at as rapid a pace as is consistent with the nature of the work, and they believe that in the course really of a comparatively short period all the land in India which is capable of irrigation will be dealt with.

BEER RETAILERS' AND SPIRIT GROCERS' LICENCES (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

Amendments reported (according to Order). Further Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^d.

COPYRIGHT BILL [H. L.]

Order of the day for the House to be put into Committee read.

LORD MONKSWELL: In moving that the House do resolve itself into Committee, I am afraid that I shall have to make one or two observations upon the Bill. On the second reading I stated that the Bill in its then condition as drafted by Lord Thring was a tentative measure, and your Lordships will not be surprised to hear that it has undergone considerable modification in Committee. One object of the Committee was to simplify the law by assimilating it in all cases of artistic work. To a great extent this Bill does simplify the law, for as regards various important matters the law is made the same with regard to all artistic work. For instance, every kind of artistic work will have the same term of copyright, that is to say, during the life of the author and thirty years after, and copyright will be attracted to all artistic works, whether made by subjects of the Queen or by anybody else, and wherever they are made. There is no restriction either as to the person who can obtain copyright or where the artistic work is to be made. Again, in no case will registration be necessary to attract copyright. Now, my Lords, in all these particulars the Bill has undergone no change in Committee, but a further and very difficult question arose with regard to artistic copyright, and that is as to the respective rights of the author and the owner of artistic works in default of any agreement as to what those rights should be. This was a question very much discussed in 1878 both by and before the Copyright Commission, and by a bare majority of one it was recommended that on sale, in the absence of agreement, copyright should pass to the owner of the work, and not remain in the artist. This recommendation was vigorously assailed by the whole body of artists. It was contended that subject to certain restrictions in favour of the buyer the copyright should remain with the artist. The Select Committee has taken a good deal of fresh evidence on this matter, both oral and written, and they have bestowed much thought and labour on the question, and they have arrived at definite conclusions as to the principles on which the Legislature should proceed. But the drafting details are exceedingly technical. I am not at all sure that everything is covered; in fact, I am quite prepared to hear that the Bill leaves a great deal to be desired in the matter of drafting details; but as the Bill cannot pass this session the Committee do not attach very much importance to this defect in detail. It is submitted not as a measure that has been carefully thought out in every detail, but as containing the main provisions of a just settlement of the respective claims of artists and those who deal with them. The Committee have adjusted the claims on somewhat different lines according to the nature of the artistic work. The Committee place the painter and the draughtsman in one class, the sculptor in another, and the photographer in a third. With regard to painters and draughtsmen, with respect to portraits painted on commission the Committee propose to leave the law as it stands at present; that is to say, the person giving the commission and not the artist will enjoy the copyright, but as to all other pictures painted on commission the artists' contention has been adopted by the Committee in its entirety, and the law has been altered by retaining copyright in the artist, and not transferring it to the person giving the commission. Further, where a picture is not sold on commission, but is sold out of a studio, the artist, according to this Bill, is to retain the copyright on a sale in the absence of agreement. The law at present is that the artist loses the copyright on sale, and in the absence of agreement the buyer does not get it, so it becomes lost. We propose that it shall go to the artist. Now, copyright of the artist is in all cases subject to a proviso against making or authorising replicas against the wish of the owner of the painting. Replica is defined to be a copy so like the original as to be calculated to deceive an ordinary observer. So much for the painters and draughtsmen. Now I come to the sculptors. The sculptor hitherto, unlike the painter, has been the spoilt child of legislation. The sculptor enjoys privileges that artists in their wildest dreams would never think of asking for. Their copyright is absolute, and it is subject to no restriction at all in favour of the purchaser. Busts, statues, ornamental work of every kind, even when executed on commission and only for private use, can be copyrighted by the sculptor without consulting the owner at all. The Committee had before them the celebrated sculptor Mr. Brock, and he told them that no sculptor of repute would think himself justified in making the replicas of sculpture intended only for use in private houses unless the owner gave leave. The Committee have decided to make the law conform to the practice and to prohibit replicas of sculpture made on commission except where the work is intended to be located in some public place. With regard to photographs, what the Committee propose is this: that copyright not only in portraits, but in all photographs made on commission, shall belong to the person giving the commission. I think the only other thing I need say is that provisions have been introduced for the detection and for the punishment of infringement of copyright that are quite sufficiently stringent. I ought to say in conclusion that I do not propose to carry the Bill beyond its present stage. I propose to have it printed and circulated for criticism during the vacation, and I have to ask your Lordships' leave to make one alteration in Committee in this Bill. It is a drafting alteration. By some error two alternative sub-sections have been put into this Bill which are not intended to stand together, and what I hope your Lordships will agree to is to strike out one of those sub-sections in Committee.

House in Committee (according to Order). The Amendments proposed by the Select Committee made.

A further Amendment made; and Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 206.)

TITHE RENT-CHARGE (IRELAND) BILL

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 to 8 amended, and agreed to.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): I understand that some of my noble friends from Ireland consider that the new clause I propose to move is open to objection. I have intimated to my noble friends that I propose to take the Report stage on Thursday, and I understand they agree that it will be convenient that I should now just state the object of the new clause, and that they should reserve their opposition until we get to the Report stage. I can state very briefly the purport of this Amendment. The Bill dealt with a state of facts which had taken away and left non-existing all powers of revision of ecclesiastical tithe. I confine myself to that for the purpose of this sub-section. At the time when that was the state of the law in Ireland, power was given to the Land Commission that they might of themselves permit a redemption of tithe without any authorisation from the Treasury at twenty years purchase instead of twenty-two and a half. It was suggested in the House of Commons by the Chief Secretary that, the circumstances changing, and the power of revision being resumed, and a substantial reduction in the tithe being the obvious result, it would be only reasonable from the Treasury standpoint, the Executive standpoint, to restore to the Treasury the power of deciding whether they would adhere to the period of 22½ years or take a lesser number of years purchase. The Amendment which I propose merely seeks to restore that power, under the altered circumstances, to the Treasury. By the Irish Land Act of 1896, there being then no power of revising, and therefore no power of reducing tithes, power was given to the Land Commission of themselves to accept twenty years purchase, and no longer was the consent of the Treasury needed for that particular operation of taking less than 22½ years purchase. But now, when tithes are going to be largely and substantially reduced, the Treasury and the Executive think it reasonable that there should not be a reduction on both sides, and that, if there is an absolute power of reduction in the amount of the tithe, it is reasonable to give again to the Treasury the right to be heard on the question whether less than 22½ years shall be taken. I am aware that that does not commend itself to my noble friends, but perhaps they will allow the Amendment to go through now, and raise their objections on the Report stage.

*THE EARL OF MAYO assented to that suggestion, and said he would put down Amendments to this clause for the Report stage.

Amendment moved—

"In page 4, after Clause 8, to insert the following new clause: '9. Sub-section 1 of Section 37 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896 (which dispenses with the consent of the Treasury to the redemption of tithe rent-charge as therein mentioned) shall not have effect in the case of any tithe rent-charge to which Section 3 of this Act applies.'"—(Lord Ashbourne.)

Amendment agreed to.

Remaining clauses amended, and agreed to.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 207.)

IRISH FISHERIES—INSPECTORS' REPORTS.

*THE EARL OF MAYO, who had on the Paper the following question—

"To ask Her Majesty's Government if the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries held inquiries in Limerick, Killaloe, and Athlone on 30th January, 1st February, and 3rd February, 1900; and if the Limerick Board of Conservators applied on 28th March to the Irish Government for a copy of their Report thereon; and if the Irish Government refused it. That as a Bill is now before the House dealing with the matter, will the Government lay the Report upon the Table, or allow those interested in the Bill to see the Report?"— said: It may be in the recollection of your Lordships' House that I moved the rejection of a Bill called the Shannon Water and Electric Power Bill. That was a Bill affecting very materially the fisheries in the River Shannon. The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries held an inquiry in Limerick, and it was most important that those interested in the Bill should know the result, but for some reason the Report had been held back. There is a strong suspicion that the Inspectors of Fisheries reported that the Bill would be most harmful to the fisheries, and it would be of great advantage if the Report could be laid on the Table.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: The Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries on the subject of the works proposed to be carried out by the Shannon Water and Electrical Power Company was prepared for the information of the Government, and it would be contrary to official usage to publish it. For this reason the application made by the Limerick Board of Conservators for a copy of the Report was refused, as was also a similar application made by the promoting company; and a like objection exists to the publishing of the Report as a Parliamentary Paper, or to any other form of publication. The Government therefore regret that they are unable to comply with the request of the noble Earl.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order); Amendments made; Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 208.)

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I think my best exposition of this Bill will be to read to your Lordships the only operative clause of it, which is—

"It shall be lawful for Her Majesty by proclamation to prohibit the exportation of arms, ammunition, and military and naval stores to any country or place therein named whenever Her Majesty shall judge such prohibition to be expedient in order to prevent such arms, ammunition, military or naval stores being used against Her Majesty's subjects or forces, or against any forces engaged or which may be engaged in military or naval operations in co-operation with Her Majesty's forces."

I believe the circumstances of the time are such that there is no one who can read those words without seeing what they are pointed at—the absolute necessity of being able by law to prohibit the exportation of arms, ammunition, military or naval stores, which, though exported from this country, may be used in aid of Her Majesty's enemies. That, my Lords, is the whole scope and object of the Bill, and I am quite sure your Lordships will be glad to give it a Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

SOUTH AFRICA — SETTLEMENT OF SOLDIERS IN THE ORANGE RIVER COLONY AFTER THE WAR.

LORD WOLVERTON: I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government, whether, in view of the many applications already made, they can give this House an assurance that they are preparing, or have in contemplation, some scheme by which soldiers, either time-expired or otherwise, can settle under advantageous circumstances in the Orange River Colony.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of SELBORNE): My Lords, this question has never been lost sight of for one moment by Her Majesty's Government, who have been, as was stated by Mr. Chamberlain in the House of Commons more than a month ago, in constant communication with Sir Alfred Milner on the subject. The matter has been referred to an inter-Departmental Committee, comprising representatives of the War Office, the Treasury, and the Colonial Office, and this Committee has already begun to sit. I hope, therefore, before long to be in a position to lay all the facts of the case before Her Majesty's Government. I cannot say more at the present moment except that the matter is receiving and will receive our most earnest consideration, but it is one in which obviously any steps that may be taken demand the most careful and thorough consideration.

The Earl of Halsbury.

LORD WOLVERTON: I think it would give confidence in the country if my noble friend would state who is the chairman of the Committee.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I am not in a position to state that.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight of the clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—POSITION AT PEKING — RECENT NEWS.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN
(Stirling Burghs) : I beg to ask the Under
VOL. LXXXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether there is anything to communicate to the House about China.

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have very little in the way of news from China, but perhaps the House would like to hear the statements made to us with regard to the safety of the Legations at Peking. A communication has been received at the Foreign Office from the Chinese Minister to the effect that the Legations were unharmed, and we have received from Shanghai a translation of an Imperial Decree, dated July 18th, as follows—

"In the Confucian work 'Spring and Autumn,' it is written that Envoys shall not be killed. How can it then be supposed that the Throne's policy is to connive at allowing the troops and populace to vent their wrath upon the foreign Ministers? Excepting the murder of the German Minister by the riotous people, which offence is being vigorously investigated, the other Ministers are being protected for a month past by the Throne with a ceaseless energy, and fortunately have suffered (? group omitted) harm."

A telegram was received on Friday at Shanghai from the Governor of Shantung transmitting a cypher message from the United States Minister to his Government, which purported to have left Peking on July 18th. This message was undated and was to the effect that the United States Minister was in the British Legation under fire from shot and shell. The date given by the Chinese to the United States Minister's telegram is the same as that of the above decree, and the assurances of safety contained in the decree are not borne out by the latter. The Consul General telegraphed to the Governor of Shantung asking how it was that a message from Peking could reach Chinan-Fu in two days, and why we had had no message from Sir Claude MacDonald. The reply was as follows—

"The United States Minister's telegram was sent by Tsung-li Yamen by a messenger travelling 600 li (roughly 200 miles) a day. I assure you there is no telegraphic communication. I cannot explain why Her Majesty's Minister has not telegraphed. But I beg you not to be anxious, for the Ministers and others are all living and unharmed; of this I have already had several reliable messages."

Seeing that over a month has elapsed since any communication has reached Her Majesty's Government from the Peking Legation, and that the Tsung-li Yamen are communicating by messenger with various Chinese authorities, Her Majesty's Government feel that they cannot attach credence to any statements or decrees attributed to the Emperor or the Chinese Government unless fortified by letters signed and dated by Sir Claude MacDonald or other British official, or by telegrams in our cypher.

THE YANG-TSZE VICEROYS.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Foreign Office have received a letter from the China Association urging that what the position in the Yang-tsze region requires is not only promise of help to the great provincial officials in putting down possible disturbance, but a clear and explicit expression of the intention of Her Majesty's Government to uphold and protect in their persons, properties, and offices those who have ventured to range themselves on the side of order and loyalty to their obligations; and whether, in view of this expression of opinion, and the pressure which is notoriously being brought to bear upon the great Viceroys of the Yang-tsze region and others, Her Majesty's Government are now prepared to give them the explicit assurances required.

MR. BRODRICK: Her Majesty's representatives have been in constant communication with the Yang-tsze Viceroys, and the assurances they have asked for have been given.

MR. YERBURGH: Has the Foreign Office received the letter from the China Association?

MR. BRODRICK: I believe the letter has been received.

CHINESE REPRESENTATIVES IN THIS COUNTRY.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is in accordance with ordinary diplomatic usages that, while our countrymen are being massacred in China, the representatives of the Government of China in this country should be invited to, and received as honoured guests at, State and official functions; and whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any steps to indicate to the representatives of China in this country their views with regard to recent events in China.

MR. BRODRICK: The answer to the hon. Member's question depends on the state of facts at Peking, with which, as I have already told the House, we are imperfectly acquainted. Her Majesty's Government have not failed to take every measure in their power to bring home to the Chinese Government their views as to recent events in China.

EXPORTS OF MUNITIONS OF WAR TO CHINA.

COLONEL PILKINGTON (Lancashire, Newton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Government have come to any decision with regard to stopping the export of arms and ammunition from this country to China for the use of the Chinese; and, if so, whether he will communicate the nature of such decision to the House; and whether any ironclads, torpedo boats, or other vessels of war are now being constructed for the Chinese by British firms, or are in course of transit from British builders to the Chinese; and, if so, whether the Government intend to stop these vessels, either on the water or in the building yards.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): This question should be addressed to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. My hon. and gallant friend must be aware that a Bill has been introduced in another place to effect this object.

PEKING LEGATION—NAVAL GUARD.

SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that a list of non-commissioned officers and men of the German Marines, under Count Goblen, who were sent up to Peking to guard the German Legation, was published some days ago in Germany; and if he can explain why this cannot be done in the case of British Marines, under Captain Halliday, who were sent up to Peking to guard the British Legation.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Commander-in-Chief has not up till now reported the names of the men forming the Marine Guard at Peking; we have telegraphed to him to do so. He has not yet sent the information.

PROVISION FOR THE SICK AND WOUNDED IN CHINA—HOSPITAL SHIP PRESENTED BY MAHARAJAH OF GWALIOR.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what has been done to provide for the proper care of the British wounded at Tientsin and Ta-ku; and whether there is any hospital accommodation at Wei-hai-wei.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Her Majesty's Government have no special information as to the arrangements made at the front for the wounded in the recent engagements; but there were available the medical staffs of the various British men-of-war under Admiral Seymour, and General Dorward took with him other medical officers and appliances. As regards hospital accommodation at Wei-hai-wei, there is a good hospital on the island, and good stone barracks convertible to hospital use if wanted. General Gaselee has telegraphed that as soon as he reaches Wei-hai-wei, he will report on its suitability for the location of base hospitals. The water supply in the island is good and ample. To this I have to add that the Government of India have already provided a hospital ship, and are prepared to supplement this accommodation by converting three transports into hospital ships. The American hospital ship "Maine" has also been placed at the disposal of Her Majesty's Government, and I am glad to take this opportunity of expressing our gratitude for this great act of generosity to the Atlantic Transport Company, which has furnished the ship, and to the American ladies who have provided the funds for equipping and maintaining it. I have also to inform the House that I have received from the Maharajah Sindhia of Gwalior the offer of a fully equipped hospital ship for China, upon which he is willing to spend twenty lakhs. This princely offer is made on behalf of himself, his mother, and his wife, to testify their loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen Empress. Her Majesty's Government have expressed their acceptance of this most munificent offer, and their deep appreciation of the motives which actuated His Highness to make it.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.

COLONEL WYNDHAM MURRAY (Bath): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the instructions to the Commission of Inquiry into the medical arrangements in South Africa will include the making of a thorough inquiry on the spot by the medical members of the Commission into the results of inoculation for enteric fever, in preventing the disease, or lessening its effects.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The inquiry to which my hon. and gallant friend refers, though doubtless one of very great importance, appears to be outside the scope of reference of the Commission, and it would require somewhat different circumstances to investigate a purely scientific medical subject of the kind suggested.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Mr. Harrison, who has been appointed a member of the South African Hospitals Commission, holds an appointment as member of the Army Railway Council, a body which advises the Army authorities in matters of railway transport and engineering, and has the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the Army; and will he state in whom is the appointment to seats in the Army Railway Council vested, and was that council, of which Mr. Harrison is a member, consulted in the matter of railway transport in South Africa, which will form one branch of the subject matter of the inquiries of the South African Hospital Commission, of which Mr. Harrison is also a member.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe he is not a lieutenant-colonel in the Army. He is, however, a member of the Army Railway Council, an unpaid body called into existence at the request of a Departmental Committee of experts in order to advise the War Office, not on anything connected with South Africa or South African transport, but simply on the question of transports and mobilisation within the four quarters of the United Kingdom.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: By whom are the appointments made?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They are made by the War Office, of course. Whom else could they be made by?

PUBLICATION OF DESPATCHES.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now state definitely that the South African war despatches already asked for will be in the hands of Members before the House is asked to consider the Supplementary Estimates for war services in South Africa.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not myself think that these despatches have any direct connection with the Estimates to be introduced by my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War, but I frankly admit I should be very glad to lay the despatches on the Table, and I had hoped that by the time the Estimates would be discussed we might have considered that the operations of the war were at an end, or practically at an end, in which case it would be possible to lay them at once. That, however, appears to be a sanguine estimate, and I do not quite see how it is possible now to lay the despatches on the Table in view of the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman and others on both sides of the House that anything which contains commentary upon military operations going on or the discretion of officers engaged should not be published while those military operations are in progress.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot enter into a controversy on the subject now, but I must firmly protest against any such sentiment being attributed to me.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for North Kerry, I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state approximately the amount of money to be asked for in the Supplementary Estimate in connection with the war in South Africa; and also approximately what portion of the estimated gross cost of the war in South Africa will Ireland have to contribute.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is impossible at present, I think, and certainly premature, to give any estimate of the kind asked for. As for the Supplementary Estimate which is to be brought forward, that will be in the hands of Members to-day or to-morrow, and, probably, it would be better for the House to wait till they have the estimate in their hands than for me to attempt to give any account of its contents. I may, however, say that some of the rumours I have seen published as to the magnitude of the financial operations contemplated by the Government are altogether fantastic in their proportions.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Why should the Irish people be compelled to contribute towards the cost of a war which they abhor?

[No answer was given.]

TRANSPORT OFFICERS—REWARDS AND DISTINCTIONS.

MR. LAMBERT (Devon, South Molton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the work of the transport officers at the ports of embarkation will be recognised in connection with any rewards that may be distributed for services during the past year.

MR. GOSCHEN: I must deprecate Parliamentary questions with regard to rewards and distinctions. The responsibility rests decidedly with the Board of Admiralty, and the grace of conferring any distinction might easily be marred by any appearance of Parliamentary pressure.

BOER PRISONERS FOR CEYLON.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any number of Boer prisoners of war have been or are being sent to Ceylon; and, if so, how many, and to what place.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. Lord Roberts telegraphed on the 12th inst. that a body of prisoners would leave for Ceylon in a few days, but their number was not stated. Preparations have been made for the reception of about 2,000 prisoners and their guards at Bandara-wolla, in the hill country.

RECENT MILITARY OPERATIONS.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for War whether there is anything to communicate to the House about South Africa. There is a rumour that there is some news from South Africa.

MR. WYNDHAM: I think that all the news there is has been published this morning.

HOSPITAL RETURNS.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state the number of men now in hospital in South Africa from causes other than wounds.

MR. WYNDHAM: It has already been explained to the House that it is not practicable to give the information required. The numbers vary from day to day and we receive no telegraphic information about them. I can, however, give the admissions at any place, at any date, if that will satisfy the hon. Member.

BOER WOMEN SENT TO THE ENEMY'S LINES.

MR. C. P. SCOTT (Lancashire, Leigh): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can now state whether a proclamation was issued at Pretoria on Wednesday last ordering the wives of all Boers believed to be in the field against us to report themselves to the authorities on the following day in order that they might be sent into the enemy's lines, and whether they and their children have been so sent; and whether among these women are included any who have been rendered destitute through the destruction for military purposes of their farms and crops.

MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir. No Report has reached the War Office.

3RD INNISKILLING FUSILIERS.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state how many men of the 3rd Battalion Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers, stationed at Cowshott Manor Camp, responded to the call made in February last to volunteer for service in South Africa; were any deprivations of privilege made in the case of men who then declined to volunteer; and how many men responded to a further call for volunteers made upon this corps in the present month, and have any of the corps been visited with displeasure for refusal.

MR. WYNDHAM: As I stated in reply to this question on Thursday, the 3rd Inniskilling Fusiliers was not asked by the Secretary of State for War to volunteer for service abroad, either in February or later.

MILITARY LANDS ACT, 1892.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, in regard to England and Scotland respectively, if he will state how many county and borough councils have exercised the powers given for the purchase of land under the Military Lands Act, 1892; what number of acres has been so purchased; what sum has been so expended; and what proportion of that sum has been borrowed under the powers conferred by the Act.

MR. WYNDHAM: The War Office has cognisance only of cases where compulsion is required, and only one such case has occurred among purchases made by county or borough councils, viz., at Great Yarmouth. The Local Government Board has cognisance of all sums of money borrowed under the Act; two cases have occurred, a loan of £12,600 to the town council of Nottingham, for the purchase of 120 acres of land for rifle ranges; and a loan of £123 to the town council of Chesterfield, for the purchase of two roods of land for a drill hall. But when the council is able to buy the land by agreement, and without borrowing, the transaction is not reported to any Government department.

WAR OFFICE EMPLOYEES' BONUS.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he can state whether, seeing that the privileges of certain War Office employees computed at 1s. a week, were taken into consideration when their minimum wage was raised to 22s. a week, these men are not entitled to a certain bonus; and whether he will see that a storehouseman named Wales (Army Clothing Department), who, after serving for seventeen years, was discharged in consequence of an accident, receives the bonus for that number of years service, irrespective of the compensation he received for injuries.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): The Superannuation Act directs that gratuities on discharge shall be calculated on wages, and there is no power to vary the basis of assessment. Wales obtained under the Workmen's Compensation Act a weekly allowance which cannot be supplemented by a gratuity. The hon. Member does not accurately state the amount of the minimum wage.

CAPTAIN NORTON: Did not the man in question receive compensation in consequence of injuries sustained? Is he not therefore entitled to a bonus?

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: No, Sir. The workman in question received what he got under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and he was not entitled to anything beyond that.

CAPTAIN NORTON: Is he not entitled to a bonus?

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I do not know what the hon. and gallant Member means by a bonus. If he will speak to me privately I may clear up any misunderstanding.

LANCASHIRE VOLUNTEER ALLOWANCES.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office when his decision will be announced as to the supplementary grant to be paid to certain Lancashire Volunteer regiments in respect of their travelling expenses, which have been 5s. per head above the usual grant; and whether any special allowance is to be made for the carriage of cycles to and from camp.

MR. WYNDHAM: The question of the travelling expenses referred to has been decided in favour of the corps, and the necessary instructions have been sent. There is no special grant for the conveyance of cycles; the allowance of £2 is intended to cover all extra incidental charges.

KILWORTH RIFLE RANGE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether proceedings are at present pending or contemplated on the part of the War Office to acquire for the purpose of adding it to the Kilworth Rifle Range a large tract of land in the immediate locality; and will he state under what Act these proceedings are being taken, what stage they have reached, what area of land it is proposed to acquire, and how many families it is proposed to evict.

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: No, Sir; there is no such intention.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Then what was the meaning of the communication addressed to the Cork County Council, stating there was such an intention?

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: That, no doubt, had reference to the schedule of a Bill introduced into another place, and since withdrawn.

ARMY SHIRT CONTRACTS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he will state the total quantity of Army shirts tendered for and supplied respectively by shirt manufacturers in the United Kingdom for the troops in South Africa during the past twelve months; what proportion was tendered for by manufacturers in the south of Ireland, and were their tenders accepted; what were the conditions of specification as to quality stipulated for by the Government, and were those conditions complied with by south of Ireland manufacturers; and, seeing that the identical quality of shirting previously accepted by the Government was offered at a lower price by one of the largest manufacturers of those goods in the south of Ireland, and that the tender was declined, can he explain why Irish manufacturers have received none of the Government contracts for Army shirts.

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: The total quantity being supplied is about 700,000; 31,000 were offered by south of Ireland firms and were not accepted. The material was to be flannel or union mixture containing not less than 50 per cent. of wool. In some cases the supply was to be to War Office pattern; in others the contractors were allowed to submit their own patterns. If there had been great emergency at the time the orders referred to were placed, some samples submitted by south of Ireland firms might have been accepted, but there was then no difficulty in meeting the requirements from the more suitable samples submitted by other firms. Nothing is known as to the particular case referred to in the second paragraph, but nine Irish manufacturers received orders, and a considerable number of other shirts were manufactured in Ireland by firms whose head offices are in Great Britain.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Out of the many millions spent on these matters, has threepence gone to Ireland?

THE CHANNEL FLEET—VISIT TO INVERGORDON.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether arrangements will be made for the Channel Fleet to visit Invergordon this summer.

MR. GOSCHEN: Beyond a visit to Berehaven for the purpose of carrying out certain exercises, the movements of the Channel squadron subsequent to the manoeuvres have not yet been decided upon.

SAILING TRAINING SQUADRON.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty can he say what officer, or officers, and what men have been in charge of H.M.S. "Raleigh" and of the other three ships of the sailing training squadron since this squadron was put out of commission and laid up on 31st October, 1899; have any officers and men lived on board the ships since that date, and, if so, how many on board each ship; are these ships now in sufficiently good condition to enable them to be fitted out again for sea; what other ships besides these four would be available for use as a sailing training squadron; and is it proposed to build any more ships that would be so available; and, if so, when is it expected that these latter will be ready for use.

MR. GOSCHEN: It is not possible to give all the information asked for by the hon. Gentleman within the limits of an answer to a Parliamentary question. Generally speaking, the ships forming the recent training squadron have been in the hands of care and maintenance parties at the ports since they were put out of commission last year. Of these a limited number live on board when necessary. The "Cleopatra" is about to replace the "Curaçoa" as a sea-going training ship for boys. The "Raleigh" is fit for service at sea. The "Volage" would need a thorough refit before being commissioned for sea service, and the "Champion" a refit of less extent. The following ships are available for service, but they would require extensive repairs, and re-boiling at once or after a short period:—"Calypso," "Active," "Cordelia," and "Curaçoa." With reference to the last question of the hon. Member, the hon. Gentleman knows the shipbuilding programme for this year, and I am not prepared to anticipate next year's programme.

FOREIGN MEN-OF-WAR IN JERSEY HARBOURS.

MR. LAMBERT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether foreign war vessels are constantly manœuvring in and out of the harbours of Jersey; and whether there are any regulations limiting such vessels from practising these evolutions.

MR. GOSCHEN: No recent reports of the proceedings of foreign war vessels, as suggested in the question, have been received by the Admiralty. There are no special regulations as to the limitation of vessels practising evolutions, but attention would be called to any infraction of international usage, should such occur.

MR. LAMBERT: What are the rules of "international usage"?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have said there are no regulations.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): Is it not notorious that French men-of-war have been manœuvring in these waters? Is it in accordance with ordinary usage?

MR. GOSCHEN: My attention has not been called to the fact.

ROYAL MARINE OFFICERS' CLOTHING.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether officers of the Royal Marines serving on board ship in warm climates are compelled by regulation to wear white clothing, and are also compelled by regulation to wear khaki clothing when engaged in active operations ashore; and, if so, whether he will sanction the adoption of one type of hot weather uniform, so as to relieve officers of the Royal Marines of the heavy expense entailed by the present arrangement.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am informed that officers of the Royal Marines are not compelled by regulation to wear khaki clothing under any circumstances, but that description of uniform has been worn as a matter of convenience and discretion in some recent active operations on shore. I will inquire further into the matter.

INDIAN FAMINE—RELIEF STATISTICS.

MR. C. P. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he can state the total number of persons on relief in the famine districts, and the number who are still being relieved in famine camps; and whether he will obtain the statistics of deaths from cholera, which are available in India, for the information of the House before the debate takes place on the Indian Budget.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The famine telegram, dated the 14th July, and published in the daily press, stated that 6,148,000 were in receipt of relief, it added that, "Village relief and advances were replacing relief works." I cannot at present specify how many out of this total were relieved at their villages and how many were on relief works. I can obtain the total figures for cholera deaths in British districts and in Native States, so far as they are available in India, but they may not be sent in time for the debate on Thursday next.

ADVANCES TO CULTIVATORS FOR SEED AND CATTLE.

MR. C. P. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether in many of the famine districts from 75 to 90 per cent. of the cattle have died; what proportion of the cultivators in the district affected will need advances for seed and cattle; and what proportion of these can be assisted out of the 123 lacs allotted for the purpose, and the charitable funds; and whether he has information to show that there are enough cattle available in India to supply immediate needs; and if not, whether any steps are being taken to make good the deficiency from elsewhere.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I have no trustworthy information about the morality among cattle; nor can I give particulars as to the proportion of cultivators that will be relieved from advances made by Government and from the charitable fund respectively. If the funds already allotted for this purpose prove insufficient more money will be granted. No cattle have been brought into India from outside to meet the present need; but cattle are being moved into the famine districts from more prosperous parts of India.

LOANS TO NATIVE STATES.

MR. C. P. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what steps, if any, are being taken to assist the Governments of the Native States to obtain the necessary funds for making advances to cultivators for the purchase of plough cattle and seed grains.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The loans to Native States for famine purposes and the grants to those States from the Charitable Fund are intended to cover the necessary advances and gifts to cultivators in those tracts. In my answer to the hon. Member for Banffshire on Thursday, I stated the amount of those loans.† Up to the end of May 26½ lacs (£177,000) had also been allotted by the Central Committee of the Charitable Fund for expenditure in Native States.

INDIAN RAILWAYS—FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENT.

MR. GORDON (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in calculating the rate of interest under the contract powers for paying off (by annuities) the shareholders of the East Indian Railway Company in 1880, the Eastern Bengal Railway Company in 1884, and the Scinde Railway Company in 1886, the agreed results (namely, £4 6s., £3 17s., and £3 16s. 6d.) were the outcome of the same methods of interpretation as explained before a Committee of the House of Commons in 1879 by Sir Louis Mallet, Mr. Danvers, and Viscount Cranbrook.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The East Indian Railway was bought under a special arrangement outside the contract which the Select Committee of 1879 (of which I was chairman) agreed to, on the understanding that the rate fixed was not to form a precedent. In determining the terms of subsequent purchases under the Acts of Parliament the other two railways were bought under the contract, and the rate of interest was determined by the governor and the deputy-governor of the Bank as prescribed by contract. I have no knowledge of the view they took of the evidence given before the Select Committee of 1879.

MR. GORDON: May I ask whether the same method was followed on the three occasions?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I should imagine not, because the Committee of which I was chairman distinctly laid it down that sanction was only given to the exceptional purchase in 1879 on the understanding that it was not to form a precedent.

MR. GORDON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the rates of interest agreed to by the Indian Government on the termination of the contracts of the East Indian, Eastern Bengal, and Scinde Railway Companies during the past twenty years—namely, £4 6s., £3 17s., and £3 16s. 6d. per cent.—represented the average rate of interest received by persons who invested in the three India sterling stocks during the two-year period relating to each of those three contracts.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: As I have before said, the purchase of the East Indian Railway stands on quite a different footing from those of the Eastern Bengal and Scinde Railway Companies, and was not based on the average rate of interest received by investors. I have no knowledge of how the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England calculated the rate of interest for the annuities of the other two purchases.

MR. GORDON: Will the noble Lord make inquiry?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: According to the contract, the Governor and Deputy Governor are given the power of deciding what the rate is. I think it would be most improper for the Secretary of State to interfere with their discretion in any way.

STATE-AIDED RAILWAYS—DETERMINATION OF CONTRACTS.

MR. GORDON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether it is the intention of the Indian Government to pay due respect to the precedents established during the past twenty years in their policy regarding the determination of any future railway contracts; and, if not, whether he will give due notice of this intention, and an explanation of his policy in the matter.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: It is the intention of the Secretary of State in Council to act on all occasions of this kind in strict conformity with the terms prescribed in the contracts with the various Indian railway companies.

NIGER COAST PROTECTORATE—SPIRIT IMPORTS.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can say what was the amount of spirits imported into the Niger Coast Protectorate during the months of March, April, May, and June in the years 1898 and 1899 respectively; and whether any, and, if any, what number of native traders in Opobo and Old Calabar have paid duties on their stocks in store, under the proclamation of 17th May, and the amount of such duty.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I regret that I am unable to say what was the amount of spirits imported into the Niger Coast Protectorate in the months specified, as the Returns received give only the total imports for each year, and no information has been received as to the duties paid on stocks by native traders in Opobo and Old Calabar.

IMPERIAL TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION—DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he would state to the House the composition of the Departmental Committee on the system of Cable Telegraphs of the Empire, the scope, and the terms of its reference.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HANBURY, Preston): The terms of reference are "To inquire into the present system of telegraphic communication between different parts of the Empire, and to consider in what respects it requires to be supplemented. To investigate the relations between private cable companies and the Imperial and Colonial Governments (including the Government of India), the amount of control at present exercised by these Governments, and the policy which should be pursued by them in future, especially when new concessions are sought. To examine existing rates, to report how far they are fair and reasonable; and, if not, how any reduction should be effected." The Committee will consist of Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the Postmaster General, the Secretary to the Treasury, the Under Secretaries for India and the Colonies, and two members from the Intelligence branches of the Admiralty and the War Office.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON: Will the Committee have power to send for persons and Papers?

MR. HANBURY: Certainly.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON: Will the evidence and Report be printed?

MR. HANBURY: That I cannot say.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the hon. Gentleman undertake to supplement the Committee by two gentlemen of common sense?

SCHOOL ATTENDANCE AUTHORITIES—BYE-LAWS IN AGRICULTURAL DISTRICTS.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education if he can state how many school attendance authorities have made bye-laws under the Elementary Education Act of 1899, providing for the exemption of school attendance during certain months of the year of children between the ages of eleven and thirteen who are employed in agriculture.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (SIR J. GORST, Cambridge University): There are thirty-six such bye-laws now ready for sanction.

CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

MR. MATHER (Lancashire, Rossendale): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the Association of Technical Institutions has addressed a letter to the President of the Board, asking him to receive a deputation of that body to submit to him their views on the composition of the Consultative Committee appointed by him, and named in the Draft Order in Council now lying upon the Table of this House, and to call his attention to the fact that the Committee as constituted is wholly academic and includes no representative of the scientific, technical, and commercial industries of the country, in which the practical results of our system of national education have to be tested; whether this omission is intended to imply that the Board of Education will not seek from the Consultative Committee any assistance in determining and improving, from time to time, the character and quality of the whole system of our national education; whether it is the intention of the Board of Education to exclude all questions from the matters referred to the Committee by the Board; and whether, if this be the case, the Vice-President of the Board will explain to the House what are the functions and responsibilities (if any) which the Consultative Committee will be required to perform.

SIR J. GORST: The answer to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative, and to the second and third paragraphs in the negative. The functions of the Consultative Committee are defined in the fourth Section of the Board of Education Act, 1899; they are:—(a) to frame regulations for a register of teachers and (b) to advise the Board of Education on any matter referred to the Committee by the Board.

MR. MATHER: Will Section 4 cover such questions as the improvement of our system of national education?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, if referred to the Committee by the Board.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY MAPS.

MR. HAZELL (Leicester): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the limited sales of maps prepared by the Geological Survey; can he explain how it is that while the annual cost of the Survey is upwards of £17,000, the receipts from the sale of the maps is less than £1,000; whether he has observed that the maps, being published on the one-inch scale, are too small for many purposes, and that the six-inch maps can only be obtained on special application, and coloured by hand at a high price, and that their existence is but little known; whether similar maps of other countries are printed in colours, and published at a much lower price; and will he look into the question with a view to making them more widely useful.

SIR J. GORST: A Departmental Committee has been appointed by the Lord President of the Council to inquire into various matters regarding the Geological Survey, and no definite answer can be given to the questions asked until the Committee has reported.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD AUDIT CASE.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Hertfordshire, Hertford): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware of the cause of the delay in submitting to the Queen's Bench the London School Board audit case, with reference to the alleged illegal expenditure by the Board of ratepayers' money on secondary education; and will he take steps to secure that the case should in the public interest be submitted immediately.

SIR J. GORST: I am not aware of any cause which prevents the London School Board audit case being now submitted to the Queen's Bench Division. The Board of Education is not a party to the record, and has no right to interfere in the case. I do not know what step it is possible for the Board of Education to take to expedite the proceedings, but an immediate decision of the question is of the most urgent importance in the interests of education, both to the school boards and the Government Department.

RECENT POSTAL DELAYS.

SIR GEORGE FARDELL (Paddington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster

General, whether he can have steps taken to remedy the inconvenience experienced by residents in Sheringham, Norfolk, caused by the alteration in the postal arrangements, the effect of which is that letters coming by the night mail from London and elsewhere are not delivered until the second post instead of in the early morning as heretofore.

MR. HANBURY: The effect of the recent alterations in the postal arrangements at Sheringham will be to accelerate the first delivery of letters at that place, and letters posted in time for the night mail from London should be included in that delivery. The Postmaster General regrets that, owing to mistakes in sorting and to the recent temporary disarrangement of the postal service in London, some letters for Sheringham which should have been included in the first delivery have not been delivered until the second. Proper notice has been taken of the errors in sorting, and the Postmaster General hopes that the Service will be more regularly performed in future.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any date when the confusion at the Post Office will be ended?

MR. HANBURY: I can only give the assurance which the Post Office have repeatedly given me, to the effect that the confusion is over already.

SIR GEORGE FARDELL also asked a supplementary question, which was inaudible.

MR. HANBURY'S reply was that he had no information, but would find out.

EXCESS POSTAGE.

MR. DUCKWORTH (Lancashire, Middleton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he is aware that quantities of letters are delivered without the ordinary penny stamp being affixed, on which twopence is charged on delivery, and that one London postman on a certain day collected 5s. in this way on his round; and can he say if the percentage of letters so charged has greatly increased since the change was made from the old red stamp, and, if so, does it arise from insufficient gumming or inferior quality of adhesive material used, and can he state the number of unstamped letters posted in a year, and of stamps found in receptacles in which letters are posted, how much the postal authorities gain yearly by stamps thus found, how much from letters unstamped, and whether he will consider the advisability of a reduction of the twopenny fee charged on unstamped letters.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not aware how many letters are charged 2d. on delivery because they do not bear a penny stamp. No records of such letters are kept, and it cannot be stated, therefore, whether the number of charges has increased or diminished since the old red stamp was discontinued. The value of stamps found loose in post offices and left on post office counters by the public amounts in one year to about £300. The quality of the gum used is satisfactory, and the Postmaster General believes that postage stamps, which are now made of thinner paper, adhere more firmly than formerly to the covers to which they are affixed. It is not considered desirable to reduce the twopenny fee charged on unstamped letters. The expense of collecting charges for deficient postage is considerable.

INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS.

MR. HAZELL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reference to deductions for income tax, whether in the past, when the income tax has been lowered, it has been the custom to deduct the tax at the lower rate in respect of income accruing after 5th April upon the class of securities which are now under similar circumstances charged at 1s.

MR. HANBURY: The answer is in the affirmative.

SEIZURES OF FOREIGN PRISON-MADE GOODS.

MR. LAMBERT: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury in how many instances the Prison-made Goods Act has been put in force, and what has been the value and the nature of the goods that have come under its operation.

MR. HANBURY: There have been six consignments only since the passing of the Act 60 and 61 Vic., chap. 63, in which the Commissioners of Customs were satisfied that goods imported into the United Kingdom were in whole or in part of prison origin. The goods were in each case mats which the Commissioners were satisfied had been, at least, partially manufactured in Belgium by convict labour. The six consignments consisted of 126 bundles of the declared value of £183. The whole of the mats were seized and subsequently destroyed by fire.

DISTRICT MESSENGERS COMPANY.

COLONEL MILWARD (Stratford-upon-Avon): May I ask whether it is true that the licence of the District Messengers Company is not to be renewed.

MR. HANBURY: I know nothing officially on the subject. About three years ago, on behalf of the Treasury, I reduced the royalty in connection with this company for the purpose of encouraging it.

WATER FOR CATTLE ON RAILWAYS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): On behalf of the hon. Member for the St. Patrick Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether during the continuance of this exceptionally hot weather special arrangements could be made by the railway companies in the three kingdoms to enable live stock to obtain water upon journeys of any distance or delays exceeding six hours.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. RITCHIE, Croydon): My right hon. friend the President of the Board of Agriculture informs me that the Water Supply on Railways Order of 1895 requires that water shall be provided at about 1,100 railway stations in Great Britain for the use of animals carried by rail. He has received no complaint as to the inadequacy of these arrangements, which he believes to be fully sufficient to meet the object which the hon. Member has in view.

THIRD-CLASS SEASON TICKETS.

MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that many of the railway companies running into London, though issuing season tickets to first and second class passengers, refuse to issue season tickets to third-class passengers, and that, in consequence, third-class are compelled to pay in most cases more than first-class, and in all cases more than second-class passengers. Can he explain why first, second, and third class passengers are not treated alike with regard to season tickets, and required to pay an equal proportionate charge for them; and whether he will consider the position of the railway companies towards the poorer classes of suburban travellers, and take steps to secure for them conditions for season tickets similar to those accorded to first and second class passengers.

MR. RITCHIE: The issue of season tickets by railway companies is a voluntary act on their part. They are not under legal obligation to do anything of the kind, and it follows that the Board of Trade are not in a position to intervene. If, however, the hon. Member is prepared and desires to give me a specific case, or cases, of hardship, the Board will be happy to use their good offices to obtain a fair consideration of the matter.

CONVICT WARDERS AND THE RESERVE — PORTLAND ESTABLISHMENT.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Reservists have been taken from the prison warders and civil guards in Her Majesty's convict prisons, and to what extent have their places been filled up; will he explain why at the present time only six warders are now employed at the West Quarries of the Portland convict establishment to supervise 170 convicts, whereas the recognised proportion is one warder for every ten convicts; and whether the absence of a larger staff has tended to produce insubordination; and how many cases at Portland of flogging for prison offences have there been during the last six months.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): Fifty-three Reservists have been taken from the prison warders and convict guards in convict prisons. Their places have been filled with one exception. The number of convicts employed in the West Quarries is on the average 204, and the number of officers employed to supervise them is seventeen. This is one to twelve. The proportion of one warder to every ten convicts includes officers sick, on leave, and on escort, and is a fixed proportion of staff to cover all contingencies. The percentage of staff at Portland and other convict prisons has, in fact, been increased, and is over 10 per cent. There is no foundation for the suggestion that the absence of a larger staff has tended to produce insubordination. The number of cases of corporal punishment at Portland during the last six months was five.

CONVICT WARDERS' PENSIONS.

MR. J. A. PEASE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the warders at the four convict prisons petitioned last year for an increase in their pensions, and what reply, if any, has been sent to them.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I may refer the hon. Member to an answer which I gave to the hon. Member for the Richmond Division of Yorkshire on 12th March last, to the effect that such petitions have been received, but that the question of pensions is primarily one for the Treasury, and that I am not at present prepared to propose the legislation which would be necessary in order to carry the prayer of petition into effect.

SHEFFIELD LAUNDRY PROSECUTION.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Victoria Laundries, Limited, of Howard Street, Sheffield, who have been recently prosecuted and fined for breaches of the Factory Acts, are, as they assert, contractors to Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, to what Department.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I have ascertained that the firm in question have a contract with the War Office to wash for Sheffield Barracks.

BAIL REGULATIONS.

MR. HAZELL (Leicester): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the statements of Mr. Justice Wright in charging the grand jury at the Derbyshire Assizes on the 11th instant, in reference to the detention of persons awaiting trial; whether he is aware that it appeared from the calendar before the Court that accused persons had been detained for periods amounting in the aggregate to three years; that this was mainly due to justice's clerks being ignorant of recent legislation which removed difficulties once existing with regard to bail; and that, in particular, a man was brought before Mr. Justice Wright charged with perjury, who had been ten weeks in prison awaiting trial, and the jury found him innocent; while in two other charges where persons were convicted of manslaughter they were discharged because they had been three months in prison awaiting trial; and what action does the Government propose to take to prevent similar occurrences in future.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): My attention has been called to the remarks of Mr. Justice Wright at the Derbyshire Assizes. I understand that in discharging the grand jury the learned Judge modified these remarks in respect of two or three prisoners who had been offered bail before the magistrates and had refused it. There appears to be no doubt that there had been a good deal of detention before trial which might have been prevented by the exercise of the power of the magistrates to grant bail, but I have not been able to verify all the details stated in the second paragraph of the question. The Bail Act of 1898 was passed with the object of preventing unnecessary detention, and the Government have under consideration the propriety of taking steps to call the attention of justices' clerks to the provisions of this Act.

ROAD CONSTRUCTION IN THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

MR. CALDWELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the construction of the road between Cromore and Graver, in the Park District of the Island of Lewis, is now being proceeded with; and, if not, will he state the cause of the delay.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am informed by the Congested Districts Board that they are still awaiting the information from the district committee referred to in the answer given to the hon. Member on 1st May last.

INVER WATER SUPPLY.

MR. CALDWELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Secretary for Scotland is aware that the medical officer of health for Ross and Cromarty reports that the water supply of the village of Inver, in the parish of Tain, about which complaints were made last year, is still unsatisfactory; and will he state what steps have been taken by the Local Government Board in the matter.

MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I am informed by the Local Government Board that they have been in constant communication during last year with East Ross District Committee and on 26th April last received from the local medical officer an assurance that the local authority had agreed to protect the wells, cover them up, and put pumps in them, and that the works were to be proceeded with immediately. As an excuse for delay in completing these measures the local authority now plead the ignorance and prejudice of the people, who are said to be quite satisfied with the present state of matters, and have accordingly broken a pump which had been put up by a private benefactor. I am to add that the Local Government Board will lose no opportunity of pressing the local authority to do their duty in the matter.

CRIME IN COUNTY MONAGHAN.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, at the recent assizes in the county Monaghan, the judge said that he interviewed the county inspector of police, who reported the county to be in a most satisfactory state and almost free from crime; and whether, under these circumstances, he will advise the removal of the operation of the Peace Preservation Act from the county of Monaghan.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The Government do not consider it desirable to revoke the proclamation of the county Monaghan under the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act.

IRISH POLICE BATONS AND HANDCUFFS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state where the batons and handcuffs used by the police in Ireland are made, and what is the capital cost of those now employed by the Royal Irish Constabulary and Dublin Metropolitan Police.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The batons and handcuffs used by the Irish police were obtained many years ago from a firm in Dublin; it is not known where they were made. The estimated cost of these articles was about £1,900.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Were they made in Germany?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: They were obtained in Dublin, many years ago.

COUNTY COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will arrange, with a view to the passing next year of the County Courts (Ireland) Bill, to prepare and circulate a draft of the rules, orders, and forms proposed to be made under it, including the scale of court fees, proposed to be charged to litigants.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I cannot, without consulting the Lord Chancellor for Ireland, undertake to act on the suggestion of the hon. Member, but the matter will be considered.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I will repeat the question.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT RETURNS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will grant a Return showing the population, local government electorate, and poor law valuation of each county, county district (rural and urban), and electoral division or ward in each such district in Ireland, and of the number of county and district councillors for each such county, county district, electoral division, or ward.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There is no objection, in principle, to a Return such as indicated, but it would take considerable time and labour to prepare, and could not in any case be ready before October. Under all the circumstances I think it would be better to postpone the preparation of the Return until after the approaching census, as the population and valuation of the altered areas can then be stated with a degree of accuracy which could not be shown if the Return were prepared now.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Would not that involve postponement for another year?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman will communicate with the Local Government Board, I think it would serve his purpose much better.

IRISH TEACHERS AND RESULTS FEES.

MR. McDERMOTT (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland will not pay the equivalent for results fees now due to teachers in whose schools the results period terminated on 30th June, such as the presentation convent school in Kilkenny and the Castlecomer Convent School, sooner than the middle of next October, whereas the teachers of schools in which the results period terminated on 31st May are to be paid these equivalents in the middle of this month. And can he state when will the old arrears of the Education Grant, due to Irish National school teachers for 1892 and subsequent years, be paid to them.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Schools examined for results in former years in the June quarter will be paid the equivalent grant, as far as possible, with the June quarterly payments, and schools, including the two specially referred to in the question, whose results examinations took place in the September quarter will be paid the grant with the salary payments for that quarter. A Supplementary Estimate for the payments mentioned in the second paragraph has already been introduced, but the payments cannot be made until the Vote has been passed.

PUBLIC HOUSE LICENCES IN IRELAND.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will arrange for an annual Return of the number of new public-house licences granted and extinguished in each quarter sessions division in Ireland, showing in each case whether the new licence was granted in substitution for an existing licence.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am making inquiry into this matter, and will ask the hon Member to repeat the question on Thursday next.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—HOUSE RENT ALLOWANCES.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the allowance made for house rent to all married members of the Royal Irish Constabulary below the rank of district inspector is only 1s. per week; and can he state what allowance is made for the same purpose to district and county inspectors, and at what date the amount in question was first fixed, and on what principle it was arrived at.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The fact is as stated in the first paragraph; but married members of the force below the rank of district inspector are also exempt from a statutory deduction of 1s. per week from their pay, which exemption practically raises the lodging allowance to £5 4s. per annum. A lodging allowance at the rate of £21 5s. 10d. per annum was fixed in 1870 in the case of a district inspector of the third class. The allowances payable to district inspectors of the second and first class vary, according to the length of service, from £27 10s. to £40, and a county inspector receives an allowance of £50. These allowances were fixed in 1882. The allowances to officers and men were fixed on a consideration of the class of house or lodging accommodation which, having regard to their rank in the force, they would be expected to occupy.

KILTEEVAN DRUM AND FIFE BAND.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Sunday, 6th May, when the Kiltewan (county Roscommon) fife and drum band was returning from Roscommon to Kiltewan the members were accosted by District Inspector Rogers in insulting language, and that he further stated that if he had sufficient force he could disperse them, while, upon that and the following Sunday, Sergeant Higgins interfered to prevent the leader of the band addressing his comrades; and can he state by what authority these officials acted in such a manner.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am informed there is no foundation for the statements on the question so far as the district inspector is concerned. It is true that the sergeant prevented one of the leaders of the band from addressing a meeting. The band, accompanied by a large crowd, had been demonstrating at certain grazing farms in the locality with the evident object of intimidating the persons who hold these farms. The sergeant had warned the ringleaders that their conduct was illegal.

SUTTON TO HOWTH TRAMWAY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Great Northern (Ireland) Company dispute that the construction of their tramway from Sutton to Howth is illegal; and, if it is not in accordance with the Act, will he state whether the Board of Trade have ever previously sanctioned a line made contrary to statutory provisions; and, if so, where.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. RITCHIE, Croydon): I understand that the answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. As to the second paragraph the Board have no powers either to sanction or not to sanction the line. They cannot determine the legal questions at issue, they are merely prepared to certify the line as fit for traffic on the understanding that the company will at an early date apply for such further Parliamentary powers as may be found to be necessary.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman's inspector ascertain by reference to the Act the condition of the line, and whether the line is now in a legal state?

MR. RITCHIE: It is no part of our duty, nor have we inspectors qualified to determine the law on matters of that kind. All that the Board of Trade have to do is to certify that the line is fit to be opened for public traffic. We have to look after matters of safety and nothing more.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not part of the function of the Board of Trade, where the Act of Parliament states that the line shall be laid on a level with the road, and when it is laid one foot and a half above that level, to state whether the line is legal or illegal?

MR. RITCHIE: No; our functions are confined to questions of safety.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I will ask the Attorney General whether he will consider whether an indictment should not be presented in regard to this line.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! If the hon. Member wishes to put a question of that kind he must give notice.

SLIGO AND NORTHERN COUNTIES RAILWAY—MIXED TRAINS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that all trains run on the Sligo and Northern Counties Railway are not made up of passenger carriages, but mainly of heavily laden goods wagons; that on some parts of the line the engines are unable to do the haulage except at a slow pace; and that, at all the stations except two, passengers are detained at the risk of accidents and to their inconvenience while the shunting is being carried on, and about which the travelling public complain; and seeing that, owing to this practice, it takes about three hours at the present rate of sixteen miles an hour to run from Sligo to Enniskillen and vice versa, whether steps will be taken to improve the present system of working this line.

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; but I shall be happy to communicate with the railway company and direct their attention to the allegation made in the hon. Member's question.

TRUCK ACT PROSECUTION AT DUNGLOE SESSIONS.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Patrick O'Donnell, of Doochary, county Donegal, was recently fined £5 and £2 costs at Dungloe Petty Sessions for a breach of the Truck Act; and that the Queen's Bench has since ruled on appeal, in another case heard from the same petty sessions, that the Truck Act does not apply to such persons as those supplied with goods by the defendant; and whether the Government will order the amount of fine and costs to be remitted to Mr. O'Donnell.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this question. The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The proper course to adopt in all such cases is for the person concerned to petition the Lord Lieutenant praying for a remission of the fine and a return of the costs. Any such petition, if forwarded by Mr. O'Donnell, will be considered.

UNSUCCESSFUL APPLICATION AGAINST THE DONEGAL JUSTICES.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any and what reply has been given to the application on behalf of Major Johnson and the other Donegal Justices to be allowed their expenses in reference to the recent unsuccessful application to attach them; whether he is aware that Chief Baron Palles, in refusing to make the conditional order absolute, stated he regretted he had no power to award costs to the justices, and that he was shocked at the action of Mr. Mackey, the Crown solicitor, who, in order to obtain a conditional order for attachment against the justices, suppressed the fact that the mandamus had been complied with, and pretended that no case had been stated; is he aware that the justices handed him the case at petty sessions, which he declined to take; and they then sent him the case by registered letter, which he refused to lodge; that he detached a portion of the case thus sent him and affixed it to another document signed by a minority of the justices, and lodged the joint product as if it were a genuine case stated; that the judge of the Queen's Bench to whom the case was finally sent decided that the case originally refused by Mr. Mackey was a good case, and dismissed the attachment on the ground that the mandamus had been complied with; and that the court then heard the appeal on the case, and upheld the decision of the justices; and whether, under these circumstances, the Crown will see fit to recoup to the justices the expenses incurred by them in successfully defending themselves.

MR. ATKINSON: A reply has been given to the solicitor's letter to the effect that, as all the costs referred to were incurred by reason of the fact that the justices illegally and improperly refused to state a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division when required so to do, the Crown must refuse to pay them the costs. I believe the Chief Baron did state that he regretted he had no power to award costs to the justices. It is impossible within the proper limits of an answer to a question, to give an epitome of the facts of the intricate litigation referred to. I have read over several times the authorised shorthand notes of the judgment of the court, and do not find that it contains any censure on Mr. Mackey or any other Crown official. No reference is made in this judgment to the other statements contained in the question, but as far as I have been able to ascertain, most of them are without foundation, and others misrepresent the actual facts. I have been informed, however, that the Lord Chief Baron, speaking in ignorance necessarily of the ultimate course contemplated by the Executive should they have been successful in the litigation then at hearing, found some fault with the mode in which the case had been conducted by the counsel. Notwithstanding the observations of the Lord Chief Baron, I am quite prepared, should the occasion offer, to justify in this House the action of the Crown in every particular. The reply to the last paragraph is in the negative.

CORK ASSIZES—SELECTION OF JURYMEN.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at the Cork Assizes on the 18th instant, in connection with the trial of a man named Cadogan, charged with the murder of a land agent named Bird; whether he is aware that on the long jury panel being called over, over sixty jurors were ordered by the Crown to stand aside; was this system of jury selection adopted with the sanction of the Law Officers of the Crown; and, if so, what were the reasons; and can he state whether there is any precedent at a criminal assize for ordering such a number of citizens qualified to act as jurors to stand aside.

MR. ATKINSON: The answer to the first and second paragraphs is in the Affirmative. No directions other than those contained in the Circular of 12th February, 1894, addressed to Crown Solicitors, were given. The action of the Crown Solicitor in the present case was due to the fact that he was aware that efforts had been extensively and continuously made to influence the jurors in favour of the accused, and he reasonably believed that the men set aside would not, if sworn, have given an impartial verdict. It is impossible at such short notice to obtain particulars of the many instances in which as many or even a larger number of jurors were set aside. I may, however, mention the case of the Queen v. Morey, tried at the Cork Winter Assizes of 1893, when forty-one out of a panel of seventy-four jurors were ordered to stand aside.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: What reward will the Law Officers of the Crown receive for a service of this kind?

[No answer was given.]

DRIFT-NET FISHING AT ARKLOW.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland if the Board have received from the fishermen of Arklow a petition praying for the removal of the restrictions upon drift-net fishing between sunrise and sunset; and, if so, whether the Board have come to any decision on the matter.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin County, S.): The petition referred to has been received. No decision can be come to in the matter by the Department until an inquiry shall have been held by the Inspectors of Fisheries into the expediency of making a bye-law permitting the use of drift-nets between sunrise and sunset. This inquiry will be held as soon as possible.

PROTECTION OF IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland whether the Admiralty have placed at the disposal of the new Department any gun-boats to prevent steam trawlers fishing within the proscribed limits.

MR. PLUNKETT: As I have already stated, the cost of protecting the Irish fisheries from the depredations of trawlers must be defrayed out of the funds at the disposal of the Department for fishery purposes. The Admiralty have decided not to undertake this work.

MR. POWER: Have not three gun-boats been placed at the disposal of the Board in Scotland for the protection of the country's fisheries?

LIGHTHOUSE AUTHORITY AT CAHIRCIVEEN.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: On behalf of the hon. Member for North Kerry, I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland whether he can state who is the lighthouse or local authority in the Cahirciveen and Valentia districts, county Kerry, and whether, in the event of the Kerry County Council, who have already made a representation on this matter, being the local authority, the Congested Districts Board will accede to their request, which is supported by the local fishermen, by erecting a bell buoy and perch as already requested in the Cahirciveen and Valentia districts, so as to save the lives and property of men engaged in the fishery industry.

MR. PLUNKETT: I am informed there is no regularly constituted harbour authority at the places mentioned, but that the Irish Lights Board recognise the County Council of Kerry in the matter of local lights. The question whether the Congested Districts Board may make a contribution to the Kerry County Council in respect of the works referred to at Valentia and Cahirciveen will be considered by the board at their next meeting.

EQUALISATION OF DUBLIN RATES.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he proposes to take steps to give effect to the unanimous Report of the Joint Committee of Lords and Commons on the Dublin Corporation Bill, recommending the Government to bring in a Public Bill for the Equalisation of Rates in the Dublin districts analogous to that passed for London, and also enabling a joint rate for drainage and a Joint Drainage Board to be established for Dublin and the townships of Rathmines and Pembroke.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Any recommendation coming from so important a body deserves and will have the careful consideration of the Government, but, of course, it would be premature for us to announce any policy on the subject at present.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON LOCAL TAXATION.

MR. LAMBERT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state when the Royal Commission on Local Taxation will present its Report.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the Commissioners are not in a position yet to state any date.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that, so far back as October, 1882, legislation for the curtailment of the power of arbitrary committal for contempt of court was promised in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister of the day; and whether, having regard to the remarks of the Chief Justice of England in April, 1896, and to the fact that one man has actually suffered imprisonment for 743 days for that offence, the Government will take steps for the introduction of legislation to define the power of Judges to commit for contempt of court, and to render that power subject to appeal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot return any very satisfactory answer to this question. I certainly could not give the opinion of the Government without a much fuller opportunity of consulting my colleagues, and, in any case, it would be impossible to attempt any legislation on the subject in the course of the present session.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Can the First Lord of the Treasury give any information as to the course of business? There is a Blue-book relating to the Cape, the consideration of which is absolutely essential to the discussion of the Colonial Vote. It only came into the hands of such Members as applied at the Vote Office this afternoon, although it was promised it should reach hon. Members this morning. I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that this is rather short time to consider it in preparation for to-morrow's discussion. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, if he can with convenience to the House and the public, to postpone that Vote and take some other business on Tuesday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry that a misadventure has occurred about the Blue-book. These incidents make it very difficult for the Leader of the House to arrange the business to suit the convenience of the members. Under the circumstances, I will go forward with Bills on Tuesday and Wednesday. I cannot say when the Colonial Vote will be taken, but I will give the earliest notification to the House that is in my power. The Companies Bill will be taken on Tuesday.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): May I urge the right hon. Gentleman to fix Monday for the Colonial Office Vote, or, at all events, to give it preference over any other Vote on the very earliest day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My anxiety is to bring on the Vote as soon as possible, and it is only in deference to appeal made to me in a very responsible quarter of the House that I feel myself reluctantly compelled to postpone the Vote. I must be allowed to consider what date I may fix for it, and I shall be glad to take it on Monday if it is convenient.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): Could not the Colonial Vote be taken on Thursday or Friday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that would be inconvenient, as those days have long been allocated.

MR. CHANNING: Will Effective Supply be put down each night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, but no attempt will be made to commence it after midnight.

HIGHWAYS AND BRIDGES ACT (1891) AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Committee read, and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC LOCAL VETO (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment to Second Reading [2nd May] upon Wednesday, 25th July, read, and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

COUNTY COURTS (IRELAND) BILL [Lords].

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 310.]

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

James Archibald Morrison, Esquire, for the County of Wiltshire (Southern or Wilton Division).

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

On the introduction of this Bill,

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury explain what this Bill is? Judging from the precedent of former years, I expect it will be found to include an atrocious Act with reference to Ireland—an Act passed in 1881, and called the Peace Preservation Bill. Is it included?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): Yes, it is.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the House a list of the Bills included in it, instead of dealing with the House of Commons in the cavalier manner of simply raising his hat? I believe there are something like thirty-four Acts included. I should like to give the House some information as to this Act, which was only to last five years, and ever since 1886 has been renewed year by year. It has now come to be a formal proceeding—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must be aware that the practice has been not to discuss any particular Bill on the Second Reading, still less on the leave to introduce. The proper time to discuss a particular Act is in Committee, when the schedule is reached.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I will content myself with entering my protest against this method of keeping expiring Acts, and especially this atrocious Act, in force.

Bill to continue various expiring Laws, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hanbury and Mr. Attorney General.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

"To continue various expiring Laws," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time To-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 311.]

MILITARY LANDS BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): It may be convenient that I should premise our consideration of the Second Reading of this Bill by a short explanation. The Bill comes down from another place, and since the House of Commons reserves to itself the exclusive right of initiating any proposals which may throw a charge even on local rate-payers, I need not deal with a great portion, at any rate, of the first three sections of the Bill until the Committee stage is reached. The object of the Bill is to amend the Military Lands Act of 1892. That Act, I should like the House to bear in mind, was a consolidating Act and nothing more. It was introduced as such by the late Mr. Stanhope, then Secretary of State for War, and welcomed as such by Mr. Shaw-Lefevre. Governments are too often pressed to introduce Acts to consolidate legislation of this kind, and when they do so they some times incur a certain risk, either for themselves or for their successors. The date of the Act is often mistaken for the date of the policy embodied in the Act, and when defects are revealed in the Act we are told that the policy is comparatively novel and experimental, and that any extension is to be deprecated pending longer experience. I cannot too strongly insist that the Act of 1892 was a consolidation Act which simply codified previous attempts to achieve certain objects by certain methods. The object of previous legislation was to facilitate the acquisition by Volunteer corps of sites for rifle ranges, and these Acts authorised co-operation between local bodies and Volunteer corps for the purpose of financing the transaction. They also authorised the Secretary of State to draw up bye-laws to ensure that shooting was carried on with safety. The Volunteer Act of 1863, for example, specifically laid down that corporations of various descriptions might transfer land to Volunteer corps for a period of twenty-one years, and authorised the Secretary of State to make bye-laws. It is true that that Act only dealt with the acquisition of sites for rifle ranges, and limited the area to be acquired to four acres; but these limitations disappeared in subsequent enactments. The whole matter, as far as the principle is concerned, is in a nutshell. By the Regulation of the Forces Act, 1871, the power given by the Act of 1863 was extended to the acquisition of land for drill-sheds and any military purpose sanctioned by the Secretary of State, and the provisions of the Act of 1863 were extended to the Yeomanry and the Militia. I need not, however, trouble the House with the Militia, as that force dropped out of all this legislation under the Militia Act, 1882. The House is aware that larger powers have constantly accrued by a series of Acts to popularly elected local bodies as they advanced in importance, and as they advanced also towards their present democratic basis. The whole of this series of Acts giving additional powers to popularly elected local bodies as they advanced in importance was accompanied by another series of Acts authorising local bodies to use these new powers for the very same objects and by the very same methods which were sanctioned by the Act of 1863. That is to say, they might use their new powers in order to facilitate the acquisition of land for Volunteer rifle ranges, drill-sheds, and other purposes. All this legislation was consolidated in the Act of 1892. In the course of the eight years during which that Act has been in operation, one can hardly be surprised to find, as is usual in such cases, that certain defects have been revealed and certain extensions have been suggested, and unless we now remedy those defects and grant those extensions, we shall defeat the purpose and impair the usefulness of the Act of 1892, or rather of the previous Acts embodied in that statute. In the opinion of the Government, never was it more important than now to grant facilities for rifle practice for Volunteers. If we postpone this legislation, or if we fail to pass it, we shall be taking a very great responsibility on ourselves, and we shall also, I think, be showing great mistrust in the use to which popularly-elected bodies may put the fuller powers they now enjoy. I have indicated, and I think I can prove, that the objects and methods of this Bill are in respect to nine-tenths of it precisely the objects and methods sanctioned by previous legislation, and as regards the remaining tenth I might almost say its provisions are obvious. Of course, I am willing to concede that it is not enough to show in this House that a policy is an old one. It is also necessary, when we are asking for further powers, to show that it is a good one, because there are precedents for reversing a policy instead of confirming or extending it. I ask, is it or is it not a good case to say that local bodies shall co-operate financially in order to assist the Volunteer force? I think it is not difficult to prove that it is. It is sometimes urged—I believe it was urged by the hon. Member for Mid Lanark in 1897—that the whole force of anything and everything which tends towards the additional efficiency of the Volunteers ought to borne by the national taxpayer, and that no part of that burden ought to fall, even for a time or with the consent of the ratepayers, on the local body, or on the funds of the corps. That is a very sweeping proposition, and if we entertain it we shall destroy the legislation of the last thirty-seven years. But I submit it is also a very unreasonable proposition. All the Acts and the present amending Bill are based on two principles, which I think give them a very secure and sound foundation. In the first place experience has shown that the local bodies and the Volunteer corps by joining hands can secure all they want in these matters much more cheaply and effectively than the central Government could if we undertook to carry out the operations for them. In some cases it is a question not of purchasing a large fee simple or a large tract of land, but of purchasing some easement over land, and in a case of that kind the local body can approach the occupier with a much greater chance of success than could some officer sent down from the War Office, whose mere arrival is the signal for a rise in ground values within a measurable area. There are other cases in which the fee-simple must be purchased, and it sometimes happens that the local body practically control the whole of the available area. In some towns you cannot purchase the site for a drill-hall without the co-operation of the town council. On these grounds of principle, convenience, and economy I claim that the experience we have had under the past Acts amply shows that much better results are obtained by allowing the local body to lend its credit under the Public Works Loans Act. The Volunteer corps cannot, merely by the capitation grant which it earns, compass some of these operations, but it can very well enter into a bargain with the local body, which may really, in the long run, impose no burden whatever on the rates; for the local body, with its power of borrowing from the Public Works Loan Commissioners, can effect a transaction so cheaply that the corps out of its capitation grant is often able to pay both principal and interest. There is another principle on which all this legislation is based. I waive altogether the fact that the councils of many boroughs have come forward and made offers of the most advantageous character to the Volunteer corps. But we believe it is the duty of every district in this country, since we have no conscription weighing upon this land, to take upon itself a fair share of the burden of national defence. It may be said that the county councils are now being carried away by a mere emotion which will evaporate, and that they are embarking on ventures which, when viewed in a cold fit, will no longer be smiled upon by their constituents. I put all that on one side, and I say that the second principle on which this Bill is based is one which has always been accepted—namely, that persons and bodies ought to pay for considerations received. If a town council, as representative of a town, or a county council, as representative of a county, benefits by the construction of a range in a particular locality, then it is only fair they should contribute some portion of the cost. I do not disguise for a moment that the taxpayer has an interest in the provision of ranges and drill-sheds for the use of every efficient Volunteer, but his interest by no means coincides exactly with the interest of the Volunteer or of the town council. The Government in this matter is the trustee for the national taxpayer, and before providing ranges for every Volunteer force, wherever it may be raised, it is bound by the prior claims of the Regulars and the Militia, in the provision of rifle ranges. Owing to the generosity of this House and the patriotic view it has taken of its duty, large sums of public money have been authorised for the construction of ranges for the War Department, and if we deduct from the sum authorised in the Military Works Act, 1897, the amount spent in the acquisition of land on Salisbury Plain, it will be found that £500,000 has been allocated for the construction of ranges. But it is not fair to deduct altogether the sum expended on Salisbury Plain, because there we have erected sixteen rifle ranges, so that half a million of money has been spent or allocated for the provision of rifle ranges, and sixteen additional ranges have been constructed on Salisbury Plain. Until recent times this Government and its predecessors have always maintained that it was not possible or proper for the War Department to directly supply ranges to the Volunteers. We made a departure from that in the Military Works Act of 1899, under which £40,000 was specifically taken in order to provide ranges for the Volunteers, and I may tell the House that it is within the policy of the Government to provide a further sum of £130,000 for the provision of such ranges. But this total expenditure of £170,000 will not enable us to give a range to every Volunteer corps in the country, at its own door or within measurable distance, and if it is to be argued in this House that it is the duty of the national taxpayer to give every Volunteer corps a range within a short distance of its own locality, the burden placed on the country would be out of all proportion to the benefit derived. A great part of the benefit would be derived by individual members of corps and by particular towns, and if the Government is to supply ranges, not only adequate in number, but also in the most convenient places, why then the corollary of that would be that we should have to consider the composition of the Volunteers, the proportion of artillery to infantry, and the distribution of Volunteers all over the country. It would be necessary to make the Volunteers fit the range system, instead of allowing the Volunteers as now to co-operate with the local body in order to arrange a system to suit their own convenience. No Government would make itself responsible for a cut-and-dried constitution of the Volunteer force. They give us the very best available substitute for conscription. Conscription abroad gives a certain amount of military training to every male subject who is mentally and physically fit. Therefore it is not sound policy to say, "We want so many riflemen and so many garrison artillery, and no more." We are bound, if in a certain town a number of artisans come forward and wish to form an artillery battery, almost to allow the formation of that battery; or, again, if in a certain district the population wished to form a rifle battalion the Department is bound to allow it. But if the argument urged by some is to be accepted, that this having once been done it becomes the immediate duty of the Government, in behalf of the taxpayers, to put a rifle range close beside that battery or battalion, the charge put on the taxpayers would be so monstrous that no one would entertain such a policy for a moment. What would happen? The corps is raised, and then comes the demand from the local body that the corps should go into camp close by the local town. Having raised the corps in this patriotic manner they wish to see their friends exercise quite near them, and to take some part of the indirect emoluments, the pleasure parties, and the trade which are derived from a camp and accruing to the benefit of the locality which has raised the corps. But if this benefit accrues to the locality, then I say it does obtain a consideration, and is bound to contribute a certain amount of the cost. Keeping in view the question of pounds, shillings, and pence, the policy and the proposals of the Bill are very reasonable. It would not suit local bodies if the Government were to say that every corps should have a range, say, within fifty miles, and that they must take their chance as to which corps was to have use of it in turn. It is better that the Government on behalf of the taxpayer, the local corps, and the local body on behalf of the ratepayers should be allowed, as they have been allowed in the past, to come to an arrangement which is for the benefit of all three. That was the object of previous legislation, and that is the object we seek to attain by this Bill. It will give a certain amount of elasticity which is found necessary in the objects contemplated and sanctioned by Parliament. It will be found that the only extension proposed in the first section of the Bill is to authorise local popularly-elected bodies to give and purchase land, and to use the public credit to borrow from the Public Works Loan Commissioners to purchase land for the benefit of the Volunteer force. All that is added by the section is that having done this they may achieve the object they have in view by also lending their credit in order that land may be used for the purpose for which it is bestowed. Unless this is done some of the operations which have been actually entered upon are defeated and rendered of no avail. In 1897 the town council of Hanley gave a site for a Volunteer drill shed. The corps began to build a drill shed on the site, but it was found that the town council could not under the legislation as it now stands transfer to the corps such a title as would enable the corps to use the borrowing powers it enjoys in order to erect a building. There was an absolute impasse; the town council had created a perpetual trust on behalf of the corps, which brought none of the benefits to the corps which they intended to give, and the corps is saddled with the useless burden of a site for a drill shed. It was the intention of the consolidating Act of 1892 that such transactions should be carried through successfully to an object which would redound to the benefit of all. That is why we introduce the words "or may contribute." It is a phrase well known to the law. It is used in cases in which local bodies are allowed to assist certain institutions. If local bodies are allowed by the law to assist local corps to get ranges and drill grounds and sheds, then it is only reasonable that we should frame the Act in such a way as to secure the accomplishment of those objects. I intend in Committee to move an Amendment at the end of line 5, inserting the words "at the request and for the benefit of a Volunteer corps." I do not think that they are quite necessary, but as it stands the section may be misunderstood by hon. Members. They may think that the words "for military purposes" cover intentions which do not exist. All the previous legislation and the consolidating Act of 1892 contemplate such assistance being given only to Volunteer corps and Yeomanry corps. Yeomanry corps for the purpose of this legislation come in as they ought to come in as Volunteer corps, all the more since it is evident that the Yeomanry are becoming largely mounted infantry, and not cavalry, and that the rifle will be their arm, and not the lance. In passing the legislation of this amending Bill, all we contemplate is the assistance of local Volunteer or Yeomanry corps by popularly elected bodies. As a matter of fact, they did exist in the earlier draft of the

Mr. Wyndham.

Bill, but they were omitted under the idea that it might be possible to bring in rifle clubs under the scope of this legislation. That might be a desirable thing, but since there is no provision for rifle clubs in the earlier Acts to provide for the purchase of sites, it is not clear that we can graft them on in this amending Bill, and it will be necessary at a later date to introduce some special enactment for their benefit. Section 2 extends to urban districts the powers which are conferred on county councils and borough councils. Why not? Urban districts of the size of such places as Aston Manor, with a population of 69,000, or Rhondda Valley, with a population of 88,350, electing their own local bodies, should be allowed, if they please, to use the powers conferred upon them by Parliament for the object which Parliament has sanctioned over and over again during thirty-seven years. Section 4 re-enacts a section of the Artillery Rifle Ranges Act. It gives to the First Lord of the Admiralty the powers which were possessed under the previous legislation, and which will be possessed under this Bill by the Secretary of State. Section 5 is also a drafting section, and Section 6 avoids the necessity of passing a special enactment for each Provisional Order passed under the Military Lands Act, 1892, a necessity which has arisen from some obscurity in the drafting of the Act. Section 7 applies the Act to Scotland, and Section 8 provides that the measure is to be construed as part of the consolidating Act of 1892. The House will see that the measure, therefore, is strictly an amending Act to the consolidating Act of 1892. I think the House will feel that facilities ought to be given for the acquisition of rifle ranges, and that it is our duty to remedy defects, to grant the extensions which are necessary, if the objects contemplated in previous statutes are to be effectively attained.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Wyndham.)

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): I will not follow the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary through the previous legislation. I take my stand wholly upon the Military Lands Act of 1892, which, as he says, was a consolidating statute, and which is the existing law. A great deal of what the Under Secretary has said in regard to the powers granted by previous Acts is not embraced within the Act of 1892. He has told us that nine-tenths of the powers asked for under this Bill are embraced in older Acts. If that is so, there is no need for these nine-tenths, but only for the remaining tenth. I would point out that there is nothing whatever in the Act of 1892 that gives the slightest countenance to the things proposed in this Bill. The Act of 1892 was a consolidating statute passed through this House at the end of a session, and, indeed, within a very few days of the prorogation. There was no discussion on it, and the only two Amendments made in Committee were moved on behalf of the Government—one formal, and the other to omit "etc." The legislation of 1892 was therefore the production of the Unionist Government itself, so that whatever praise or blame attaches to that Act attaches to Her Majesty's Government. If the Act has been faulty, that faulty legislation must be laid at the door of Her Majesty's Government. The Military Lands Act of 1892 only dealt with the acquisition of land for military purposes; and the Act defines what military purposes are. They include rifle and artillery ranges, the erection of butts, targets, batteries, and accommodation for the storing of arms for military drill, and other purposes connected with military matters approved by the Secretary of State for War. It is, however, important to note that the Act did not, and does not, authorise the acquisition of land by local authorities for butts, targets, batteries, drill-halls, or other permanent works. The parties who are authorised by that Act to acquire land for military purposes are, first, the Secretary of State for War, who, however, can always acquire all the land for military purposes that he requires. That power is unlimited, and there is no intention on the part of the opponents of this Bill to limit in any measure the power of the Secretary of State for War to erect whatever works he considers necessary. The second body authorised to acquire land are Volunteer corps, with the consent of the Secretary of State; and the third, the council of a county or a borough, which may, at the request of one or more Volunteer corps, purchase and hold land in behalf of those Volunteer corps for military purposes. Now in the case of purchase by the Secretary of State the money is, of course, provided by Parliament, but in the case of purchase by Volunteer corps, the corps may raise the money by way of loan from the Public Works Loan Commission on the security of the land so acquired, and secondly on that of the grant to the corps provided by Parliament. Now the loans by the Public Works Loan Commissioners are to be repayable within a period of fifty years, and the interest is not to be more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., subject to Clause 1 of the Public Loans Act. There is no question as to my facts.

MR. WYNDHAM: I rely on the same facts, and I pointed out that this Bill gave reasonable extension.

MR. CALDWELL: Then as far as regards land acquired by the Secretary of State, no matter whether the land is acquired for military purposes or not, it is under the control of the Secretary of State, and he can make bye-laws for the protection of the public, etc., and, in short, have full control. Now when a Volunteer corps is disbanded, what is to become of the butts, and building, and the land? You find that when a Volunteer corps is disbanded, if they have acquired land for military purposes and put buildings upon the land, they have no interest whatever in those buildings or the land; the whole goes to the Secretary of State. So that you are asking a Volunteer corps to contribute money for a purpose for which they have the privilege of paying; but when the purpose is served and the land is sold they are to have no right to the money which they have advanced either for the purpose of acquiring the land or for erecting buildings upon it. Where land has been acquired by a Volunteer corps by means of a loan through the borough council, and the Volunteer corps is disbanded before the borough council can appropriate or sell the land, it must be offered to the original owner at a sum to be fixed by arbitration. And we all know perfectly well that on a price to be fixed by arbitration butts and embankments and other military objects which have ceased to be used will not be said to be of any value, but, on the contrary, will be said to depreciate the value of the land. The Act contemplates, of course, use by the public of the land when it is not required for military purposes, so that it will also form an open space, and there is always eventual value in such a property when it ceases to be used for military purposes. Those are reasonable considerations why a local authority should embark in the process of purchasing land in a locality where the land would eventually be valuable to the locality, but butts, rifle ranges, embankments, and drill sheds for military purposes are of no use when they cease to be required for military purposes. There is not much risk to run in acquiring land for military purposes by an easy method of payment extending over fifty years; but it is quite a different thing to do what this Bill proposes to do, to ask a Volunteer corps, on the faith of a local authority, to expend money in all these things, which, when they are no longer used, only depreciate the land, and not repay them the money they have advanced. There is one subject which the Under Secretary in his résumé did not deal with. He did not deal with the Bill of 1897. If he had looked at that Bill and the state in which it passed he might have seen something to call his attention to the reason why opposition to this Bill was likely to take place. As the Volunteers Act limited the Volunteers and borough councils to acquiring land, the present Government brought in a Bill which was practically word for word Clause 1 of this Bill. It was said that the only object of that Bill was to make plain the Act of 1892, which was meant to give powers to build as well as to acquire land. But the Bill of 1892 did not do that. Now what became of the Bill of 1897? It came up early in the session of 1897 and was opposed, and eventually, in order to get it through, the Government had to submit to a compromise which I had some little hand in carrying through, and the effect of that compromise was that they had to eliminate everything with regard to the councils that would place a penny of expense on the local rates. In that modified form the Government consented to take the Bill, and it passed through the House and it received the Royal Assent early in the session. That being the result of the Bill of 1897 brought in by the Government, can it be supposed that the people who strenuously opposed that Bill would not oppose this, which not only proposes to do everything that the Bill of 1897 did, but proceeds still further in the same direction? Clause 1 of this Bill not only reopens the whole of the questions in the Bill of 1897, but Clauses 2, 3, and 4 introduce new matter of a highly controversial nature. I admire the courage of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War, but if the right hon. Gentleman the present Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, then Under Secretary for War, felt bound to abandon an attempt to burden the local rates in this manner, how does the present Under Secretary for War hope to carry through this Bill this session? The Volunteer corps, who may have contributed three-fourths or nine-tenths, are to have no share or interest whatever in the buildings the moment the corps is disbanded, or after the buildings have ceased to be used for military purposes. Will the Under Secretary of State for War tell us where the Volunteers get the funds for the erection of these buildings and butts? I think they will understand at the War Office, from the Estimates, what money is given for the purpose of erecting butts and targets for Volunteers. That is quite a distinct purpose, and if money is given for that purpose Parliament should give it directly. Let the land be in the name of the Secretary of State for War; let it be subject to his control, and let him be responsible. Supposing you do not get a shilling from a local authority or a Volunteer corps, what is to hinder you from coming to this House and getting every penny you require for the erection of butts, targets, or anything else for military purposes? That is the proper course, and one advantage of it is that you can take it with the most perfect confidence, without having to consult any local authority or without being influenced by any local authority in the matter. You can act in this matter quite independently, because you do not require to consider whether, as regards the site of a rifle range, a certain local body is willing to contribute so much money. Your duty is to consider, in the interest of the Volunteer corps, where the most suitable place would be for a rifle range or the other works for military purposes. I cannot understand where a Volunteer corps is to get the money. Is it to come out of their own money? I have heard complaints that the Volunteers get too little money and require more. I have never voted against any proposal to increase the Vote to the Volunteers; and it appears to me strange that we should have appeals for more money to the Volunteers, and at the same time attempt to pass this Bill, the object of which is to impose on Volunteers the burden of providing rifle ranges and all these other things. There is also this to be said, that a Volunteer corps may hypothecate and pledge in security of their loan from the Public Works Loan Commissioners the Government grant-in-aid which is given for other purposes. Where can be the morality of a transaction of this sort? It puts me in mind of what was done in the case of Ireland, when grants-in-aid to local authorities for the poor and the insane were pledged in security of the payment of certain advances under the Land Purchase Act. That was always considered on this side of the House a most immoral thing to do. I venture to say that no grants are given to the Volunteers or anybody else except for necessary purposes. I find it is proposed that these grants may be pledged for a purpose altogether foreign to those for which the money was specially granted. Observe why this burden is placed on the Volunteers. Simply because it so happens that a certain community are very patriotic and loyal and raise one or more Volunteer corps. Because, forsooth, they happen to do that they are to be called upon to contribute more for military purposes, whilst other districts with an equal or greater population are not to be asked to contribute a single shilling of these expenses. The principle is utterly unsound. Then we come to the power to be conferred on the council of any county or borough. The principle is not a whit more defensible, where it is proposed that the council of any county or borough—

"May maintain and adapt for use, by the erection of buildings or otherwise, or may contribute towards the maintenance or adaptation for use of, any land held for military purposes, and for this purpose may borrow, [and the Public Works Loan Commissioners may lend] in like manner as they may [respectively] borrow [and lend] for the purpose of acquiring land under the Military Lands Act, 1892."

The land is not vested in the county or borough council at all, and it might eventually fall into the hands of the Secretary of State for War. Then they are to borrow the money on the security of the county rate or the borough rate. The purposes for which the money is to be applied are essentially military in their character. There is nothing local as regards its uses. It is rather strange to find this proposal to saddle local authorities with the upkeep of things which are essentially for Imperial military purposes, when these local authorities receive out of the Imperial funds grants to mitigate the burden of the local rates. The people who stand in need of assistance for local purposes are to have handed over to them by this Bill a burden for works which are essentially of a military character. They are to be asked to bear this expense because they happen to be exceptionally loyal and patriotic in the way of raising Volunteer corps. They require rifle ranges for the purpose of making themselves efficient. The ranges are only useful to the Volunteers in training for the national defence. Are not the men giving their time and their leisure for the purpose of making themselves efficient? Yet you would say to them, "Oh, these things are being done for your benefit, and therefore you should pay part of the expense." There is one essential thing with regard to all methods of local rating, and that is that the control of the purpose for which the rates are levied should remain with the local authority. That is why I called attention to the fact at an earlier part of my remarks that this land would be entirely under the control and at the mercy of the Secretary of State for War, and not under local control in any shape or form. You are asking the local authority to tax the ratepayers, while another body outside and independent of them will have the whole power over the expenditure of the money. The local authority will have no say. That is contrary to the principle of local government, which is that everything should be under the control of the representatives of the people in the local council. Clause 2 goes a great deal further than was proposed in 1897. It provides—

"The powers exercisable by a borough council under the Military Lands Act, 1892, and this Act may be exercised by the council of any urban district, and any expenses incurred by the council of an urban district other than a borough in the execution of those powers shall be defrayed as part of their general expenses incurred in the execution of the Public Health Acts, and any money borrowed by the council for the execution of those powers shall be borrowed in accordance with the provisions of those Acts, and may be lent by the Public Works Loan Commissioners."

This power of the urban district council is open to all the objections I have stated with regard to the granting of similar powers to the council of a county or borough. But there is this further objection, that in the case of the urban district council the expenses are to be defrayed as public health expenses. I daresay the Under Secretary for War is aware of what the effect of that would be. All the moneys which may be borrowed for military purposes will be computed as part of the borrowings under the Public Health Act, with the result that the amount of the borrowing power, which is limited under that Act to two years of the annual value of the property, may be eaten up for these military purposes, and nothing may be left for the necessary public health purposes. That shows that you will even put the military purposes before the necessary public health purposes. This Bill makes no provision whatever for consulting the parishioners on the question of the expenditure of the money. You put no limit to the borrowing powers, and in this case there is no limit to the extent to which a locality may be rated. The local rating has quite a different incidence of taxation from Imperial rating. In the case of local rating, under the present system you have to make land the assessable commodity, and, in England particularly, the rates are paid wholly by the occupier. There is therefore this curious result in the Bill, that in the case of an urban district council in England the rates will be paid wholly by the occupier, while in the case of Scotland the rates will be paid half by the owner and half by the occupier. If the country is being invaded, who gets the benefit of the defence against that invasion? Surely the owners of landed property and property of all kinds, as well as the occupiers, will get the benefit, and why should the burden of making provision for national defence be placed upon the occupiers only in the case of England? I take it that by giving this power to local authorities there is no intention of having anything done which is not necessary. We may therefore assume that these buildings are all necessary for military purposes. That being so, I ask on what principle the occupier only, the shopkeeper who pays an inordinate share of local rates, should be assessed in this way, while another man, who may have a large income, but only a small rateable value, pays a very small amount? National defence ought to be paid for out of the Imperial purse, in regard to which the contributions are fixed upon the nation as a whole according to what Parliament in its wisdom thinks a proper division, without reference to local considerations. Obviously, the Imperial system of taxation is the best and fairest. Volunteer corps are having these ranges for the purpose of practising for the defence not of particular localities, but of the country as a whole, and there is not a single element of local needs in the matter. Clause 3 introduces a still more objectionable system, namely, that of hiring land—an altogether novel system—for military purposes. The land is to be hired under Sections 9 and 10 of the Local Government Act, 1894.

MR. WYNDHAM said it was proposed to omit that provision.

MR. CALDWELL: That certainly does away with that objection. In Clause 4 you introduce a principle which is somewhat novel in its character, and if a novel principle is introduced we expect that that principle should be introduced when there is ample opportunity for its discussion, and not at the tail end of a session. Some parts are, of course, quite unobjectionable. There is no objection to the Navy having the same powers of making bye-laws for land acquired for naval purposes as the military authorities have, but you touch a most delicate matter when you begin to apply to the sea the same elements of power that you have upon land. If you interfere with any private right, it comes under the Lands Clauses Act; you take care that the landed proprietor shall get his full pound of flesh in such an event; but observe what is done when you deal with public rights. I venture to say the Under Secretary gave us no authority whatever for this mode of dealing with public rights on the sea. In Sub-section 4 "public right" is described as—

"the right of navigation, grounding, anchoring, fishing, bathing, walking, or recreation."

Fishing, for example, I think is most important.

MR. WYNDHAM said the words were already on the Statute-book.

MR. CALDWELL: I am referring to dealing with the sea.

MR. WYNDHAM referred to the Act of 1885.

MR. CALDWELL: At any rate, under this Bill you claim rights of a most extensive character as regards the sea. You do not limit yourselves to the three-mile limit; and you take powers to dispense with those permanent marks which are necessary under the military clause. The powers here sought may seriously affect fishermen, and it must be remembered that this Act applies not only to Scotland and England, but also to Ireland. How are the public rights of fishing and anchoring disposed of here? In the case of a man with a value of £50 at stake, he will get compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, but in the case of a public right of this kind, the whole thing will be given away by the approval of the Board of Trade. One Government Department is to sit in judgment on another Government Department; they may adjudicate upon and sign away the public interest to-morrow, as far as this Bill is concerned. Moreover, there is no redress. If ever there was a case for having a Provisional Order which should come before the House, this would be that case. It is not a case of emergency; it is a matter in which there is plenty of time to make your arrangements and to know your policy; you cannot acquire lands and erect buildings all in a day. It is altogether unreasonable to expect that the Board of Trade should have the right to interfere in this way with the sea and the use of the sea. All I have to say with regard to this Bill is this: that the Under Secretary of State for War seemed to think that if we refuse the powers asked for in this Bill, we will in some way impair the national defence. There never was a grosser mistake than that. The contention here is that if these military works are necessary they ought not to be provided at the expense of the local authority. If they are really necessary, then let the Government make their arrangements and come down to this House and ask for whatever they require for military purposes. The Government would then get the money without being hampered by any local authority, and it is absurd to say that if we reject this Bill we shall prevent the carrying out of any of these military requirements. My suggestion gives you the biggest purse, and we do not ask you to be hampered by the parsimony of any local authority in providing a rifle-butt which is not sufficient, but which is, perhaps, as much as their means will allow. Instead of relying upon the local authority, who ought not to contribute out of the rates, we ask you to come to the Imperial purse and get any money you require. I move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I rise to second this motion, for the purpose of getting a reply from the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary to the important points made by my hon. friend. Previous legislation of this kind has dealt only with land, but this Bill deals not only with land but also with the buildings on the land and other things which do not necessarily belong to the land. Such things ought to come within the purview of the Imperial Government, and should not be put upon local authorities. I entirely agree with my hon. friend when he says that he has not the least desire to minimise or prevent these facilities being given to local rifle corps. The object he has in view is that Imperial funds shall be applied for Imperial purposes, and that no demand should be made upon the local rates for objects which ought to be paid for out of the Imperial purse. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree that the House has made a most generous provision at all times whenever it has been called upon by the present Government for military purposes. I have heard that acknowledged over and over again. I have never opposed any provision whatever which has been made for the Volunteers. My own opinion is that the Government have done too little rather than too much for this very useful force. It is not in the faintest degree any opposition to the interests of the Volunteers that has actuated our opposition to this Bill; but, on the other hand, it is a desire that the Volunteer force shall not be crippled in any respect, because one cannot expect that local authorities will pay the same attention to Volunteer regiments as the Imperial authority is able to do. There is another point which my hon. friend raised, which I think deserves the attention of the House. For purposes of this kind we should have complete equality of taxation as between county and county and district and district. This duty is one which lies upon all, irrespective altogether of the place in which they live, and in cases of this kind it is only right that the common purse should be used. Another very important point made by my hon. friend was that the land would remain under the control of the Secretary of State, and not in any way under the control of the local authority; and, moreover, if it ceased to be necessary to use the property, the council would only be able to obtain the unpaid instalments due upon it. There is another point which has also been very properly raised, and it is that money for these purposes will be raised under the Public Health Act, and as the borrowing powers of a council are limited under this Act, and as the purposes for which money is needed under this Act are continually increasing, it would unduly limit the borrowing capacity of an urban or county council if it was found necessary to borrow for military purposes under the Public Health Act. The hon. Member opposite hinted that we had a jealous mistrust of popularly elected bodies exercising these new powers. I should like to know where any jealous mistrust exists on this side of the House of the way in which popularly elected bodies use their powers? We have tried over and over again to obtain further powers for popularly elected bodies, and when the Local Government Act of 1888 was passing the House, attempt after attempt was made to enlarge the powers of local authorities by hon. Members on this side of the House. Therefore it is not from this side of the House that any jealous mistrust of that kind comes, but we do mistrust any raid upon the pockets of the local ratepayers for purposes of this kind. It was certainly not from this side of the House that any opposition came to place the whole of the police entirely under the control of local authorities. We do not jealously mistrust these local authorities, but what we say is that it is not the business of these local authorities to spend money for this particular purpose. We say, moreover, that there are certain powers now exercised by the local authorities which ought to be taken over by the Imperial authority. For instance, there is the work of port sanitary authorities, which really does not belong to the local authorities at all, but belongs more properly to the Imperial Government. We consider that local authorities stand in such need of assistance that we give them £12,000,000 or £13,000,000 a year by way of aiding the local rates. The policy now proposed is inconsistent, and for military purposes strictly Imperial in their character the local purse ought not to be drawn upon. There is one other matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the House for one moment. I was glad that the hon. Gentleman stated that the Bill is to refer only to Volunteers, and for these particular purposes. The position we take up with regard to this Bill is simply that the demand which the Government now make upon the House is to enable local authorities to do work which ought to be done by the Imperial Parliament out of the Imperial Treasury. It is neither just nor fair to call upon local authorities to do this work. At times of great and patriotic excitement there is nobody who wishes to refuse anything that is asked for in this House, and it is the duty of the Imperial Government to carry out this work. We are willing to do all you ask us in order to make the Volunteer force more efficient, and you are not likely, so far as I am concerned, to meet with the slightest difficulty in that direction. I think you might do a great deal more for the Volunteer force to make it effective, but I venture to say that such a proposal as this is not the right way to go about it. Work of this kind should not be put upon local authorities, and matters of Imperial concern ought to be dealt with by the Imperial Parliament.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*MR. MONK (Gloucester): I rise for the purpose of expressing my great satisfaction with the Government for bringing in this Bill, and I hope it is their intention to carry it into law. I have listened for a good hour to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lanark, and I confess that I was greatly surprised at his line of argument. The hon. Member who has just seconded the motion took a similar line of argument, which is to the effect that the Government ought to provide for everything which is required for the Volunteer corps. For years past the Volunteers throughout the country have been asking the Government for assistance in providing rifle ranges, and two years ago a little flutter was caused when the Government brought in and passed an Act in which provision was made for acquiring rifle ranges in different parts of the country. When, however, the Volunteers asked for a portion of the money allotted for them they were met with this answer—namely, that the whole of that sum would have to be expended in providing rifle ranges for the use of the regular forces. In many parts of the country, and in the county of Gloucester especially, the rifle ranges are far too distant from the headquarters of the Volunteer corps. I heard with great satisfaction from my hon. friend this afternoon that a further sum of £130,000 is to be applied for the purpose of providing rifle ranges for Volunteers. In the case of the rifle corps in my own county, the corporation of the city I have the honour to represent expressed their desire to co-operate with the Government as far as possible in providing these rifle ranges, and I was astonished to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite expressing reluctance to authorise the local authorities to assist in providing ranges. They seem to overlook the fact that the local authorities are under no obligation to take action under this Bill, but I cannot understand on what ground hon. Gentlemen opposite refuse to grant to the elected representatives of district urban councils and town councils permission, under the authority of Parliament, to assist in providing these ranges. I only desire to express the hope that the Government will pass this Bill, for I am sure that the step they have taken is one which will be greatly appreciated by the Volunteers throughout the country.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I do not rise to take part in this debate because I feel the smallest interest in the subject of the Volunteer force, or the rifle ranges with which they are to be provided. The Government are afraid to permit Volunteers being established in Ireland, and accordingly, so far as this Bill deals with Volunteers, it has not the smallest interest for me. The reason I take part in this debate is that on a former occasion when this House took an opportunity of dealing with this subject of rifle ranges for Volunteers the War Office played what I can only describe as a very despicable trick on the public of the three kingdoms, and especially of the country to which I belong. I am not in the habit of using excessive language, but I think when the House hears what was done on that occasion it will not be astonished that I have characterised it as I have. In 1891 one of the most important of these Acts was passed. It was called "An Act to facilitate the acquisition of ranges by Volunteer corps and others," and any Irish Member reading that title, and knowing as we all know that Volunteers are impossible in Ireland, might well have assumed that the Bill had no application to Ireland, and also that it only dealt with the subject of rifle ranges and nothing else. What are the facts? Under that Act the War Office, in breach of the rules of this House, and in breach of the confidence which should exist between Members of the House and the Government, introduced a section depriving the public of these kingdoms for the first time of having the compensation, to which they were entitled when their property was taken away from them by the Crown, fixed by a jury. Until that Act was passed, when the Crown interfered with private property and took it over for rifle ranges or for any other purpose of military defence, it was the right of the subject to have the compensation to which he was entitled assessed by a jury of his countrymen, but into this Bill facilitating the acquisition of ranges for Volunteer corps a clause was introduced not limited to rifle ranges, but enabling the War Department, whenever they took property in any part of the United Kingdom for any purpose, to have the compensation assessed, not by a jury, but in another mode, and that section was applied to Ireland. When the War Office had to take a large tract of land in the county of Cork from the statutory tenant, who, under the Land Act, has practically a fee-simple subject to a rent, they proposed to have the amount of compensation assessed by two paid removable magistrates, paid employees of the Government, who might be dismissed at a moment's notice.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not find any reference to the Act of 1891 in this Bill.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Oh, yes, Sir; I shall show that what I am saying is perfectly relevant.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Act of 1891 was repealed by the Act of 1892.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: That is the point. It was repealed save the one clause to which I have been referring, and which was foisted into a Bill with which it had nothing to do, thereby practising a fraud on the House and the country. I say respectfully that these Military Land Bills are becoming a public nuisance and a public danger. We never seem to be done with them. They began to be passed in 1842, and I will not venture to say how many of them have been passed since then. But it now appears to be the practice that we are to have a Military Lands Bill every session, just as we have an Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. When are we to be done with them? Very few people are acquainted with them. The average Member of Parliament cannot be supposed to understand them, and neither can the average lawyer, because they do not come within the scope of his ordinary practice, and when one of these Military Land Bills is introduced no one except a member of the Government has any cognisance of what it may contain. It is that which enables the War Department to practise its deceit on the House of Commons and the country, as was perpetrated in the Act of 1891. I think we are entitled to ask that the last word should some time or other be said on the subject of taking land from private owners in a compulsory manner for the purposes of military defence. About thirty of these Acts have been passed, and the unfortunate lawyer who is concerned with the subject has to wade through them all. It is not a subject that is treated in the ordinary textbooks, and the lawyer who has to deal with a case has perhaps to read twenty or thirty of these Acts before he knows how the rights of his client may be affected. Why do we not have one single Act, compressed into a reasonable compass and in an accessible form, showing the powers of the Government on the subject? It is a matter in which we in Ireland are very deeply interested. I asked the Financial Secretary of the War Office a question about a project for taking some four miles of territory in the heart of the county Cork for an addition to the Kilworth rifle range. We did not object to these ranges being set up in Cork, although they involved a considerable displacement of the people, but surely there must be some limitation. As I understood the hon. Gentleman, the original proposal would bring about the eviction of about thirty to forty families. That may be very well in England, because when a farmer is turned out of his land he gets compensation, and he can invest his money in a way that will bring him his living. But in Ireland, when a man is turned out of his holding, he has nothing to do but go to America. When I asked the hon. Gentleman a question on the subject he first contradicted me flatly, and if I had not had some acquaintance with the matter, I would have been deceived by his denial, although I am sure he did not intend that.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): The hon. Gentleman is referring to an answer I gave him a little while ago, and I then informed him that it was never intended to permanently purchase for the purpose of a rifle range the land near Kilworth to which he refers.

MR. MAURICE HEALY : My complaint is that the answer of the hon. Gentleman would have had the effect of deceiving me if I had not been acquainted with the subject, and I venture to say that when Members of this House ask questions they ought to expect answers giving full information, and not answers which amount to a deceit upon them, though of course the hon. Gentleman did not intend that result. There ought to be no hugger-mugger about taking four miles of land for military purposes, and when questions are asked they ought to be answered frankly, and we should not be put off with an answer such as that given to me by the hon. Gentleman at first. He gave me further information when he saw I had it already, but if I had not had it I would have been deceived by the flat denial he gave me. I am sure it was a truthful answer, but it was an answer which had the effect of an untruth, and that is not the sort of answer I desire to get. That illustrates in a remarkable way the difficulties which are involved in these Bills. I will give another illustration of the hardship under which the subject is placed by these Military Land Bills. When the Crown proceeds to take land, litigation is in effect set up between the subject and the Government. The Government can command the best legal advice, whereas the unfortunate occupant whose property is being taken away may be very poor, and even absolutely destitute. That man is placed in a position of being a litigant against the Crown. In a particular case I have in my mind, one of the litigants against the Crown succeeded in establishing in the Queen's Bench in Ireland that the procedure set on foot by the Crown was wholly wrong, and that the Crown were not entitled to do what they were attempting. If an ordinary litigant proceeds against me, and I succeed, I am entitled to get my costs ; but when I am a litigant against the Crown the Crown is fighting on velvet, and even if I succeed I cannot get any costs, but if the Crown wins it gets its costs against the subject. I intend for my part to take every opportunity which this Bill will afford to endeavour to effect some reform in this branch of the law. It is quite time some check were put on the extraordinary powers now exercised by the War Office. They are able to fight with all the resources of the Treasury at their back, and when an ordinary litigant gets the advantage of them, and is proved to be right, he nevertheless has to pay his own costs.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I desire to say one word as regards this Bill, not only as a Volunteer—in which capacity I support it in the strongest possible manner—but also as one of the Members representing a great corporation. My right hon. friend the Member for the Ecclesall Division, and myself, have been requested by the Corporation of Sheffield to do all we can to obtain all possible facilities for supporting and encouraging the Volunteers. The Corporation of Nottingham and other corporations have also recognised that it is their duty, if they possibly can, to give facilities for the drill exercise and rifle shooting of Volunteers within their districts. Many of the residents in the great towns are now anxious to follow that example, and to do away with the scandal of having a great force in this country without adequate provision for drill, and without convenient rifle ranges, at a time when so much depends on the accuracy of rifle shooting. The rifle ranges are now removed too far from the Volunteers, and are difficult of access. They do not afford sufficient scope for the use of modern arms, and there is not sufficient space behind the targets. I think landowners are now anxious to fall in with public sentiment, and much must be done in this direction if we are to amend our position. There is something to be said for the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cork that the Government ought to incorporate all these Acts in one comprehensive measure. We are grateful to the Government for having recognised what has been so often impressed on them—that facilities should be given for the training and exercise of Volunteer corps, and that no impediment should be placed in the way of any of the great corporations of the country advancing money for such a desirable, useful, and patriotic purpose. I beg to thank the hon. Gentleman who has introduced this Bill. I trust the Government will persevere with it and that on no account will they consent to any modification in any essential particular.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I should like to say a few words on this Bill, as I have repeatedly drawn attention to the necessity for making provision for the rifle practice of the Volunteers. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just spoken speaks on behalf of a very wealthy corporation, and a corporation which has a direct interest in the Volunteer movement. I do not wish to reflect in any way on the patriotism of Sheffield, but it is perfectly obvious that in that corporation there may be rather a strong feeling in favour of the expenditure of public money on the Volunteer movement.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: We do not make rifles. We ought to, but we do not.

*MR. CHANNING: Perhaps I may have stretched that argument further than it is worth, but hon. Gentlemen will see that possibly a corporation like Sheffield may have a motive in aiding the Volunteers which may not exist in other parts of the country. It seems to me that we ought to consider other parts of the country, and reflect what would be the result, or rather the failure to produce any result, of a Bill like this. I imagine in many agricultural districts there will be great reluctance to call upon the rates for these purposes, and also in many of the heavily rated towns throughout the country. What I have already said will show the Under Secretary for War that I am not out of sympathy with the proposals of the Bill, so far as they go towards extending the power of the local authorities. But it seems to me that the proper form in which to pass a Bill of this nature would be to introduce amendments enabling the Exchequer to make such advances as may be necessary to facilitate the provision of ranges wherever they may be needed. I do not think this Bill will be worth the paper on which it is printed in a great many parts of the country if there is no Imperial subvention to it. I admit we may do this as a matter of local duty to a certain extent, but surely the main argument we have to consider is the extension of the Volunteer movement as an effective instrument for the defence of the country. I therefore say that my hon. friend the Member for Mid Lanark was amply justified in urging the necessity of providing out of public funds for this purpose. Owing to the continuous increase in land values it is impossible for Volunteers to provide these ranges for themselves, and even local authorities may find it difficult, owing to the rapidly increasing value of land. The upshot therefore will probably be that where there are no rich corporations like Sheffield, nothing will be done in the matter, and it seems to me that it is an Imperial duty to do what we can to assist the Volunteer movement. I have always fought against the idea of treating the Volunteer movement as merely a means of providing a certain number of men who may be turned into useful recruits for the regular Army. The Volunteers ought to be treated as an integral part of our system of defence, and developed on those lines. Having regard to these facts, the plain duty of the Government is to introduce a clause providing that the Exchequer shall aid the local authorities in these matters. So far as I am aware, in the provision made last year, nothing was done beyond making an additional allowance to enable Volunteers to attend rifle ranges, and, in the emergency scheme of February last, aid was to be given as to transport and new guns, but not as to ranges.

*COLONEL PILKINGTON (Lancashire, Newton): I hope the Government will pass this Bill. As regards Sheffield and other districts we must remember that the bulk of the Volunteer force is recruited from such large centres of population. This Bill is really to enable local bodies to provide, or assist in providing, rifle ranges, drill halls, and drill grounds. Very often corporations or local authorities have the means, without any or with hardly any expense to themselves, to assist in providing these. I know one place, with which I am intimately connected, where something like twenty acres have been provided, the use of which is to be given for drilling the Volunteers at such times and hours as may be convenient to the corporation. There is another direction in which the Volunteer force may be assisted. If an individual, endowed with public spirit, may assist his country by providing rifle ranges and drill halls, why should not the community be allowed, if they feel the same spirit, to grant that encouragement to the Volunteers? It is thought that the rifle meeting at Bisley this year has not been what it should be because the rifle ranges throughout the country have not been equal to the requirements of the force. It seems to me that this is a practical enabling measure, and I trust that it will be unanimously and quickly passed through the House.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I am not surprised that my hon. friend behind me should have made an elaborate onslaught on this Bill. In the first place, the Bill is of a somewhat confused character, and it shares the charm of a good deal of the legislation to which we are accustomed nowadays, in that it embodies so much reference to one statute and another. There is so much cryptographic matter in the whole of our legislation that it is very difficult for plain men to understand what it all means; and I am bound to say, even after the hon. Gentleman's speech, that I do not altogether understand this Bill. At the same time my hon. friend was very naturally led to point to one result of this kind of legislation—namely, that it tends to place a portion of national defence in a somewhat undue degree on certain shoulders while securing immunity for others. Sheffield may be taken as an example. Sheffield is very patriotic, enterprising, and enthusiastic, and it is willing to spend money on the Volunteers. In doing this the town voluntarily, and in a praiseworthy spirit, makes a contribution to the defence of these islands which is greater in proportion than it ought to be called upon to pay. The expenses of the Volunteers ought to be a national and Imperial cost, as far as it falls upon the public at all, and not a local cost. I have always thought that it was rather a shabby thing to say to localities, when they were claiming to be defended by forts and fixed defences, that they should subscribe or show that they were willing to bear a part of the cost of the defence works. I know that that argument was used to the city of Edinburgh, and I have always thought, although I have used it myself, that it was an extraordinary argument to employ. Probably the same thing might be said of my hon. friend's indictment of this Bill. But at the same time I hope that my hon. friend will not divide the House against the Bill. I would press upon him this fact, that the action taken by the municipalities and public bodies is entirely voluntary; if they do not choose to take part in this public service to the Volunteers they need not do so. That takes away the greater part of the sting of his attack. There may be defects in the Bill which can be cured or modified, but in the main I think that the House generally will sympathise with the general object of the Bill. It is somewhat singular to find that in 1897 this identical proposal was put forward by the Government, and at the very hey-day of the session they were obliged to drop it owing to the strong feeling against it. This feeling does not appear to be so strong in the present dog days. My attitude towards the Bill I must confess is that I think this is not the time for the House to deal with a comparatively small matter; that the War Office would be much better employed with the heavy duties connected with actual warfare, and that the Department might very well leave these legislative proposals to be dealt with in quieter times. That is my view, and it applies to this Bill as well as to others. But the Bill, owing to its purely voluntary character, is not likely to cause any great injustice in any part of the kingdom. If it does anything to facilitate the training and increase the efficiency of the Volunteers, then I think that these are objects which the House as a whole will be ready to further and aid.

MR. WYNDHAM: I feel I must express my obligations to the right hon. Gentleman for having given me practically his support in the passage of this measure. I know that he includes this in a certain category of Bills, which he tells us we ought not to have undertaken at this time. He says these are small measures, and they should be postponed till after the war is over, and until we can address ourselves to the task of making the British Army adequate to any calls that can be made upon it. I do not think that argument ought to weigh much. It reminds me of a practice which I myself often indulge in—namely, of putting off writing letters on Monday because I have to prepare a speech for Tuesday. The best way of placing the Government in a proper position to deal with the grave questions to be faced, is to pass amending Bills to ensure perfect legislation of the character which has been described. It is true that the Bill contains a great deal of legislation by reference. It refers back to the Military Lands Act of 1892, and that refers to the Lands Clauses Compensation Act and various others. I admit that I have often denounced legislation by reference, but I have become somewhat converted to the practice, and I think that there is a great deal to be said for it. After all, the powers of purchasing and borrowing possessed by the local bodies are familiar to them; they know the provisions in the Act under which they exercise these powers, and it is far more simple to refer the authorities back to the Acts than to recite the same powers over again. If you recite them over again you sometimes raise a doubt. In law, as in travel, the shortest way is the way you know. If I am to meet the objections urged by the hon. Member for Mid Lanark I would only repeat the arguments which I ventured to submit earlier in the afternoon. I do not think that as things are it can be fairly urged that the whole cost of the efficiency of the Volunteers should necessarily be borne by the taxpayers, and that no part should be borne by the ratepayers. Certainly the Government, as representing the taxpayer, ought to see that every corps should have reasonable access to a range; but many corps and many councils wish for more than that. They wish the annual camp, perhaps, to be in the park near the town, and they wish to have a range near that park: and the mayor and corporation come to the Government and say: "We are quite prepared to spend a certain amount of money in providing a range if you will allow the Volunteers and the Yeomanry to come out and camp in the park." There is the consideration for both parties, and why should not each party pay for such consideration as it asks for? I am authorised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that £70,000 of the taxpayers' money will be found for the scheme, and local authorities will contribute the other £70,000 for advantages received. That is my defence of the principle which underlies the Bill, and I must adhere to my opinion.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I observe the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War has sat down without making a single observation in regard to the charges of oppression made under the Consolidating Military Lands Act in Ireland. It is all very fine for you to bring in a Bill dealing with your own country, and with your own affairs, and it is all very fine for you to be patriotic, but why should you rob us? That is precisely what the Military Lands Act has done ever since it was first passed. It is a remarkable fact that this is a Bill which nobody can understand. Certainly it is the first time I have known you, Mr. Speaker, to have arrived at a ruling that a Bill was so badly drawn that the Speaker could not understand it. That is what has happened in the course of this debate, and the Under Secretary for War should give up the system of legislation by reference. I ask the hon. Gentleman why is it that in all the operations connected with these Acts in Ireland a desire is evinced to plunder the people of the whole of the lands taken for military purposes, while in England you are prepared to give forty to forty-five years purchase for lands similarly acquired. In Ireland the state of the law is that you provide two removable magistrates to assess the price of the land to be taken from the tenants. You might as well, if a railway company is to take land in England, appoint two railway porters at random to fix the price of the land compulsorily taken for the railway. Why should we tolerate the extension of this system in Ireland? Not long ago four square miles were taken from the Curragh of Kildare. That was an act of public plunder, and the people who had had for centuries the rights of grazing on the Curragh were not paid a single shilling of compensation. I suppose that can be defended on the grounds of public policy! The meanness of the procedure was also exhibited in the case of the compulsory acquisition of one of the most beautiful spots in Wicklow, belonging to Mr. Stuart Moore. I asked twenty questions in this House on the subject before Mr. Moore, although he is a Unionist, could get the compensation to which he was entitled. Then there was the case of Bere Island, taken by the Admiralty. The right of the tenants to compensation was to be decided by two removable magistrates, but it was actually subsequently laid down in a superior court that the Government were wrong in that particular procedure, although no costs were given against the Crown. Is it to be supposed that we in Ireland should agree to pass a measure of this kind, which has a different operation in Ireland from what it has in this country? One of the principal clauses of the Act was drawn in consequence of an Irish decision. I would like to ask the hon. Gentleman, does he understand Clause 6?

Mr. Wyndham.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. Gentleman does understand it! Well, I should like to read it to the House—

“Notwithstanding anything in Section 2 of the Military Lands Act, 1892, the period of three years mentioned in Section 123 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, shall be calculated from the passing of the Act confirming any Provisional Order under the Military Lands Act, 1892, and not from the passing of the Military Lands Act, 1892.”

And the right hon. Gentleman understands that? Well, I congratulate him. To a certain extent I understand it myself, because it was drawn in consequence of a decision upon a point raised in Ireland in respect to the taking of land, but I do not believe that any person, except a specialist like the hon. Gentleman upon this point, could understand that section. One would gather from the Bill that it does not apply to Ireland, because it begins by saying, “In the application to Scotland the following provision shall have effect.” There is not a word about Ireland. It deals entirely with Volunteers, and as there are no Volunteers in Ireland one would naturally assume that it did not apply to Ireland. But the proposition I would make is this. Give us back trial by jury when you take our land for military purposes. We do not want our lands to be taken at all, but if you do take them do not take them at twenty years purchase as you have done in the past, take them at thirty-five years purchase. Let us have the benefit of English arbitration with its 10 per cent. Give us back the old right we had ten years ago, when land was taken under the Lands Clauses Act—the power to traverse before a jury. I notice that whenever the Lands Clauses Act is referred to in this case it is the English Lands Clauses Act and not the Irish Lands Clauses Act at all. Is it a fact that you are not going to take three square miles of land at Glenbeigh such as you stated you would take from the county council because, if it is, why do you not write a letter to the county council saying that the land is no longer necessary, and ease the minds of these poor people who are expecting to be evicted? Have you done so? It was not done up to Saturday. You have not had the courtesy to do that. No doubt, in this House, Ministers can be courteous when they think their whole time will be taken up; but go down to Glenbeigh when they are beginning gun practice and laying their big guns—there we get scant courtesy. No human being is allowed to show his nose in the whole of that magnificent glen, which has been taken from us. The offers made upon which you take the land of Ireland do not show the consideration which you show in England. You select any part of the country which pleases you; you do not care a button for the people or their struggling sons, or whether it is a pleasure ground like the Curragh, which you took. If it pleases you, you take it. I can quite understand that if you occasionally purchased as much as a pocket-handkerchief for your troops in Ireland, the objection would not be so great; but you do not. The whole of your military system is supplied from this country; of the £50,000,000 you have spent for South Africa, not a farthing has been spent in Ireland; you have not bought so much as a biscuit. Then why should you buy Irish land so cheap? Give us back our trial by jury. Give us the privilege which the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself enjoyed, of selling land at thirty-five years purchase. We shall move to this Bill Amendments restoring the procedure of the Lands Clauses Act, and endeavour to give the people of Ireland some of the protection which it is desired to give. It is of no consequence to us what Government is in power in Ireland. If Ireland was invaded by the Chinese or the Turks it could not be governed in a worse manner than it is by the system which you have forced upon us, and which has been a curse to us from the first day you landed on our shores.

MR. JASPER MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow) said that the owners of the land at Kilworth, taken for military purposes, were perfectly satisfied with the price paid by the Government.

SIR JAMES JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street) confessed his inability to fully comprehend all the clauses of the Bill, but to the object of it he gave his general support. The company with which he was associated had always taken a very great interest in the Volunteer movement, and they had a great many in their employ who were Volunteers, and they found that owing to the habits of discipline which they acquired they made the best workmen. It was a scandal that the burden of supporting such a magnificent institution should be allowed to fall upon individuals, and he was not satisfied with the Bill as it stood, and it was possible that he would support some of the Amendments which would be moved in the course of the Committee stage, as he was somewhat alarmed at the idea of the local authorities having the power to take any land they might consider suitable for rifle ranges. There was a considerable element of danger in rifle ranges, and he thought some safeguards ought to be introduced in the Bill to insure that any land that might be taken for rifle ranges would be taken in such places as would reduce the element of danger to the public as much as possible.

VOLUNTEERS BILL [Lords.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith, in the Chair.]

Clause 1 :—

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire), said that upon the Amendment which was down on the Paper in his name it was not necessary to reiterate the arguments that were adduced against the Bill on the Second Reading. He had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would have seen his way not to have proceeded with this Bill at all this session. He had no desire to impede any measure which could be shown to be useful to the Volunteer or military forces of the country, but the change which was proposed in this clause was far greater than any which had on the two previous occasions been suggested, in principle if not in words.
 On both those occasions the matter had been considered and the proposal was not pressed. Upon the present occasion the suggestion was that the same words should be used in the case of the Volunteer Act as were used in the Militia and the Reserve Forces Acts which regulate the calling out of those forces. But the Volunteer force was upon an entirely different footing. The Volunteers were entirely for home defence, and the Militia and Army Reserve, whose duty it was to supplement and strengthen the first line of defence of the country, could not be considered in any way to be in the same category as the Volunteers. The object of the clause was to apply the words which were used in the Acts governing those forces to the use of the Volunteer Act. The words "actual or apprehended invasion" covered every possible emergency for which it might be necessary to call out the Volunteers, at least there was no evidence to the contrary. There was evidence that the words were considered from that point of view when the Volunteer Act of 1863 was brought in, and evidence had been adduced in the debate upon the National Defence Act of 1888, and also in the discussion which took place in 1895, in the direction of showing that after full consideration it was decided and determined that those words which it was now proposed to change were the most appropriate words for the Volunteer Act, and therefore should never be changed. The first attempt to alter the position of the Volunteer force in recent years was in the National Defence Bill of 1888. That contained a clause which practically applied to the Volunteer force the Militia Act. Any one referring to the discussion upon the measure would find that the wishes of the Government then were precisely the same as they were now—namely, to apply the Militia Act to the Volunteers. The proposals received considerable discussion in this House, and exception to those words was taken by the late Sir E. Hamlin, who pointed out that there was no utility in suggesting that there might be other circumstances in which the Volunteers might be required, because those were not circumstances which were applicable to the Volunteers, though they might be to the Militia and Army Reserve forces. It was necessary to recollect that the Volunteers were for home defence, and it was only for that purpose that that force was to be regarded. He pointed out the great danger which might arise as to the efficiency, strength and popularity of the Volunteers if without very deliberate and careful consideration the burden of liability upon them was increased. It could not be too strongly emphasised that the Volunteer force depended for its strength upon its popularity, consisting as it did of civilians who had to depend for their living upon their daily work, and an irreparable injury might be done to the force if the great burden of the Militia service was laid upon them. The result of the discussion in 1888 was that the proposal was dropped because it received so little encouragement in this House. The next occasion on which this matter came before the House was in connection with the Bill of 1895. That Bill was one of the consequences of the Committee to which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War alluded on the Second Reading of this Bill. The Committee sat in 1894, under the presidency of the Financial Secretary of the War Office of the late Government, and considered a number of matters in connection with the Volunteers. To make a long story short, just as the Government of 1888 refused to proceed in the direction contemplated by this Bill, so did the Government of 1895, even after consideration of the subject by the Committee which sat in the previous year. There was every evidence to show that the Government of that day and the Financial Secretary had considered what steps they should take, and how far they should go in regard to laying further liabilities on the Volunteer force. On that subject the then Under Secretary for War said—

“The Secretary of State, after consulting his advisers, especially those responsible for the administration of the reserve forces, came to the conclusion that it would be inexpedient to render the Volunteers liable to be called upon except in the most urgent circumstances.”

He went on to say that it appeared very important to the Government that they should preserve the voluntary character of the Volunteer force, and that the conditions under which they should be required to render military service should be restricted. The Government of 1895 proposed that the Secretary of State for War should be empowered to accept service on the part of individuals or any part of a corps “in case of imminent national danger or emergency.” That was the extent to which they were prepared to go. On that occasion the Liberal Government received the support of more than one distinguished Volunteer officer on the other side of the House. The hon. Member for Lewes cordially supported his right hon. friend the Financial Secretary in the action that the Government then took in this most important matter, and the hon. Member for Hereford, who took part in the debate, heartily endorsed the policy of the Government in proceeding cautiously and tentatively in regard to the laying of further liabilities on the Volunteers. He did not know what might be the opinion of those hon. Gentlemen at the present time. He was perfectly certain there would be very little difficulty on either side in proceeding to the consideration of any careful scheme that might render the Volunteer service more efficient, but he thought it was greatly to be regretted, at this time of the session, that this proposal should be brought forward, especially when they remembered that it was a proposal which had not been definitely made in terms before, and the tendency of which had been rejected, not by one, but by two Governments. He hoped that even now it might seem to the Government undesirable to proceed with this particular measure. What he wanted to point out on this occasion was that in a matter dealing with the Volunteer force—changing its whole position and status, and increasing the liability to service—in his humble judgment the Bill was not lightened by the dropping of the latter part. It was quite natural that the Government should decide to drop that part, considering the welcome it received last week. The first clause was a proposal to increase the obligations of the Volunteer force. If that were wise, he was sure that the Committee on a future occasion would be quite ready to consider it; but it seemed to him, seeing that proposals having a similar tendency had been rejected before, undesirable on this occasion that they should proceed any further with this measure. He moved to leave out Clause 1.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: For my own part I can say, as one who has been connected for many years with the Volunteers, and as representing my own regiment, that I think this change suggested by the Government is absolutely necessary in the interests of the country. The Volunteer Act of 1863 only provided for the calling out of the Volunteers in case of actual invasion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the rejection of the clause has served for a considerable period in the Army, and must know that if the Government delay calling out the Volunteers—230,000 men—to repel invasion until a hostile fleet is actually off the coast, or the enemy has actually set foot on our shores, it will be too late to render any effective service; and it has been long felt not only by the Volunteers and their commanding officers, but by the great mass of the force, that they will be prevented from giving effective service to the country, which it is their desire to give, not only in the event of the country being in grave difficulty, but especially in the event of invasion, if their services are not utilised until actual invasion has occurred. The hon. Gentleman opposite is correct in a certain part of the historical retrospect which he gave. It is true that Mr. Stanhope was much impressed with the necessity for something being done, and a

Bill was brought forward in the session of 1888. There was a certain amount of opposition. There was a great deal of business remaining undischarged, and in the circumstances it seemed desirable that the Bill should be dropped, but there was no serious opposition to it on the part of the great mass of the Volunteer force. I have the clearest recollection of what took place. In 1894 the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, then Secretary of State for War, assented to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the working of the Volunteer Acts and the legal condition and status of Volunteers serving under those Acts. The Financial Secretary of the War Office, the Member for Hanley, was chairman of that Committee. The recommendation of the Committee upon this particular matter was in consonance with the unanimous agreement as to the great desirability of these words being altered. For my own part, I think if the Government is to blame it is to blame for not introducing a measure of this sort before. I regret that Mr. Stanhope did not press the measure forward. It is no use introducing these measures unless the Government intends to use its majority to give effect to them. I earnestly hope that my hon. friend will not be deterred by any sign of opposition, but will persevere with this measure. I have got up to give the views of the Volunteers. The hon. Gentleman opposite affected to speak for the Volunteers. It is desirable that those who speak for the Volunteers should qualify themselves by going through the service. My hon. friend who proposed the elimination of the clause said he greatly feared it would have a prejudicial effect on the recruiting for the Volunteer force. He will admit, I think, that I am very largely interested in the welfare of the force, and that it is not at all likely I should advocate a change which would entail an extra burden on those with whom I am so closely associated. I can assure you that the Volunteers thoroughly understand the meaning of the section, and the great mass of them—although among such a body as 230,000 men some may fear it will impose increased liability upon them—think the proposed change absolutely necessary in the interests of national defence. That being so, I earnestly hope that the Government having seen fit to introduce this measure, will place it this year upon the Statute-book.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot speak, as my hon. friend does, in the name of all the Volunteers. Let us hope that he will not regard with superior contempt, which he does not always display, those who happen to differ from him. He spoke with something like contempt of hon. Members in some parts of this House who ventured to contest his doctrine as to what the Volunteers throughout the country desire. We all know that my hon. and gallant friend is a distinguished Volunteer, but I know many cases where Volunteers differ in opinion, and where he is in a minority. On this occasion I cannot accept his pontifical assertion as absolutely conclusive in the matter. This is a clause we all thought, and I in the innocence of my heart thought, was a comparatively harmless clause; but I have since looked a little more closely into the matter, and I find that although on the first blush it may seem to be very much the same thing to talk of "actual or apprehended invasion of any part of the United Kingdom" and "imminent national danger or great emergency," yet there has been found in these words a difference which deserves to be maintained. The hon. Gentleman referred to the speech made in the discussion in 1887 by the late Sir Edward Hamley. He was a distinguished soldier, and one of the greatest authorities on military questions from the constitutional point of view we have had in my time in the House, and he was emphatically of opinion that it would be almost fatal to the character of the Volunteer force if you were to alter these words. The Volunteer force is purely raised and maintained for domestic defence.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: There are 11,000 at the front.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Not as Volunteers. They have entered into a new engagement. There is not a single Volunteer serving out of the country, and such a thing has never been contemplated, and you can see the confusion we would get into if you did not keep up a distinction between the forces. What would be the distinction between the Militia and the Volunteers if you abolished the present distinction? Here I am reminded of a pamphlet or paper which I read at the time. It was called, "A Discussion held by a Body of Volunteer Officers," whom I think my hon. and gallant friend will consider of some authority. I do not think the Queen's Edinburgh Volunteers a very bad corps among all the distinguished corps in the Volunteer service, and I do not think that the present Lord Justice Clerk, Lord Kingsburgh, formerly Mr. Macdonald, is a mean authority on the subject. At a discussion in connection with the East of Scotland Tactical Society on the Report of the Committee to which reference has been made, they scouted the proposal to substitute a vague term for an exact term. Colonel J. B. Sutherland said—

"Under these conditions, and with the proposed altered phraseology, the Volunteer forces might conceivably be called upon to perform garrison duties at home when there was no prospect of either actual or apprehended invasion. I venture to think that this is no part of the duties of the Volunteer force. If garrison duties are to be performed in order to relieve the Regular forces, these duties should be performed by the Militia, and if the Militia is not strong enough for the purpose, the authorities have the remedy in their own hands by enforcing compulsory service in the Militia."

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: May I ask the date of that Report?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It was 1895. This distinction that the Volunteers are not to be called upon for actual military service except under the threat of immediate invasion is not a mere fancy, not a mere phantasmal case to make a distinction between one and another. It rests upon this—What would happen if there was an actual or immediately impending invasion? All the business of the country would come to a standstill, and those men who are Volunteers would be free, without loss of professional or commercial position, to take part in the discharge of their duties. At this same symposium which I have quoted, Captain Hunter said—

"The main difficulty of the question lies in this double individuality which each Volunteer possesses. A regular soldier, no matter what his rank, has one individuality and one only; and it is in his military capacity that he earns his livelihood. I, on the other hand, am two distinct and separate individuals; I am Mr. Hunter, chartered accountant, and I am also Captain Hunter, but Mr. Hunter is of vastly greater importance to me than Captain Hunter is. It is in my civil capacity that I earn my livelihood, and I have only engaged to undertake military service when, by 'actual or apprehended invasion' the country shall have been reduced to such a state that it will be impossible for me to carry on my profession. If the Coms proposals are carried out, I shall find liable to military service under wherever there is nothing to prevent me carrying on my civil occupation."

s a view which will no doubt occur any Volunteers. That is the ground which it is urged that a change of this although my hon. and gallant friend Member for Central Sheffield does disprove it, may prejudicially affect the rating for the Volunteers. Here are words used by one of the greatest authorities on the subject—

General Macdonald, C.B., in the discussion, said that he was strongly of opinion that the liability for service, as at present provided for, was quite sufficient, and the proposal to alter the words 'actual or impending invasion' to 'imminent national or great emergency,' was in all respects a wise one. If the words suggested were used there might be rashness on the part of the authorities at any time in calling on Volunteers. His feeling arose mainly from this, that they were substituting for words which had certain and definite meanings words which had uncertain and indefinite meanings. 'Imminent national danger' and 'great emergency' were phrases of very unimportant import, under which the Volunteers would be called upon to do duties differing materially from those contemplated under the present constitution of the force."

went on to say that it might prejudicially affect the position of the force. He did not think these are opinions of Volunteers deserving to be cast aside, even on the high authority of my hon. and gallant friend.

When I heard him lay down the case in so peremptory a manner I thought I had better sooner I addressed the Committee the better. One point which the right hon. Gentleman urged in commending the Bill to the House the other day on the second Reading was that we got rid of the awkward and inconvenient necessity of a proclamation. But a proclamation is required for calling out the reserves or embodying the Militia; so there is no more will not matter. I do not think there is much force in that. I would urge on the Committee not to make a change now—a change which has been repudiated by the House on more than one occasion, which has been commended by high authorities, although, of course, not so high as my hon. and gallant friend—a change of which we cannot at all quite fathom and measure the true effect. What is the necessity for this Bill?

HOWARD VINCENT: The Bill has been recommended by the Committee and is supported by the late Government.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: But who were the Committee?

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Your own Financial Secretary was the chairman of it.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My hon. friend the Member for Hanley, who was Chairman of the Committee, was only the bottle-holder to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who inspired it with energy and enthusiasm, and at whose suggestion it was appointed. He deserves all the credit, and I hope he will receive none of the blame, for what it has done. The words which it is proposed to alter to maintain the old character of the Volunteer force, on which all the legislation with regard to them is founded, and they ought not to be altered even under the influence of the captivating arguments of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite.

MR. WYNDHAM: I confess that I have listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition with amazement. On Wednesday last the right hon. Gentleman welcomed this proposal amid unanimous cheers from all parts of the House.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: "Welcomed" is a strong word. I was directing my fire against another proposal, and I said of this one some words to the effect that it was comparatively acceptable. But I have since looked into the Bill.

MR. WYNDHAM: The right hon. Gentleman's acceptance was so warm that I, at all events, mistook it for welcome. The right hon. Gentleman has since come upon a debate of a somewhat academic character which took place in 1895, and he now presents his own Financial Secretary, not as chairman of the Committee on this subject, but as bottle-holder to the hon. Member for Central Sheffield. That may be enough excuse for the right hon. Gentleman's right-about turn, but the Government, who are responsible for this Bill, which they believe to be of the greatest importance to Volunteers, and to be generally welcomed by them, will do their best to see it passed this session. All are agreed that the Volunteers exist to repel invasion. The only point is whether Her Majesty is bound to declare to the whole world by proclamation that she appre-hends invasion, at a time when diplomacy is at its last gasp. What I said the other day—and I am bound to repeat my argument—was that when a foreign ambassador accredited to this Court was in daily and hourly conference with our own Foreign Secretary, was not the time Her Majesty should be made to proclaim with her own mouth that she apprehends invasion. Of course it will not be done. Everybody knows that no Government would issue that proclamation, which is so different from other proclamations, precisely because it contains these words, which would be so inopportune. That is why we propose that the terms should be amended. If that be true—and I think it was generally said the other day—it follows that no step could be taken to put the Volunteers into a position to repel invasion until invasion had taken place. I say again, as I said on Wednesday last, that no War Office, after any amount of re-organisation, could turn the Volunteers into a field Army, with transport and supplies, in the course of twenty-four or forty-eight hours. It could not be done in less than two or three weeks. If this change should be refused, then all the money spent on the Volunteers is wasted, and the Volunteers are being made fools of. We have heard it said that the military authorities will call out the Volunteers rashly. The military authorities will not call them out at all unless it is the policy of the Government. To call them out would cost for the first month £2,500,000 in pay and allowances alone, while each ensuing month would cost £1,570,000. If the cost of transport and provisions and equipment is added, the first month would cost £4,000,000. I have no fear that any Government will rashly authorise that expenditure. I believe that if this alteration is made other Governments will follow in the steps of all Governments who have presided over the destinies of this country, and will not incur that charge until it is absolutely necessary.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford): I agree to some extent that this Bill is a useful measure, but the importance of it has been exaggerated. I am sure if we were in the peculiar position of being on the verge of invasion it would make very little difference whether the Volunteers were called out in consequence of "imminent national danger" or "apprehended invasion." The nation would be perfectly well aware of the reason why they were called out. I do not, myself, think very much of the argument that the character of the Volunteer force would be changed if the Bill passed into law. As a matter of fact the force has changed considerably during the last few years. When it was first established the greater part of the force were in the position described by Captain Hunter in the speech which was quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition; but within the last few years a great number of the men who have joined the force really belong to the Militia. They have joined the Volunteer force because it is the easier force—because more amusement can be obtained out of it, and they are taken away from their work less. What is really wanted is not so much a measure of this kind—although I shall vote for it—as such a training of the whole Volunteer force that when a national emergency does arise those who volunteer for that force will be of immediate use. The first object of the War Office ought to be to furnish us with a Volunteer force that is thoroughly effective, so that when men volunteer for active service they may be of use at once. If some system of that kind is adopted—

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That does not seem to be relevant to the clause under discussion.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: What I meant to imply was that in a case of national emergency the Government of the day would have at hand, voluntarily offering themselves for the Volunteer force, the class of men whom they would require to meet that particular emergency. I shall vote for this measure, because I think to some extent it may be useful, but I should not vote for it if I thought the intention of the Government was to mislead the people by making them suppose that this measure would to any large extent render the Volunteer force more effective than at present, or that by it something was done really to organise the military forces of the Empire.

*MR. C. P. SCOTT (Lancashire, Leigh): I think it is important clearly to understand from the Government what is intended to be the practical effect of the change of words here suggested. I now quite well that no intention can and the successors of, or even the present Government, but we ought to be told clearly what the practical effect will be of changing these well-known definite words for other words less definite. The Under Secretary for War gives us to understand that no change was intended, that the Volunteers would be called out under the new form as under the old form, only when the Government apprehended invasion, and that the Government did not wish to put the fact in a Proclamation for fear it should interfere with the course of diplomacy and precipitate that which they wished to avoid. If it were clearly understood that that was the intention of the Government it would make a great difference; and I hope the Under Secretary will be able to assure us on that point.

MR. WYNDHAM: I have already made two speeches in which I endeavoured to convey that idea, and I doubt whether I should be more successful if I made a third.

*MR. C. P. SCOTT: I read the Second Reading speech of the hon. Gentleman very carefully, but I do not think he made it so clear as he has now done. If that is the case, and that intention is acted upon, it will make the clause practically innocuous and also inoperative. But the House had an apprehension that that was not the whole object of the Government. It is obvious that within the last few months the country has passed through circumstances which might fairly be called "a great emergency." I think after the battle of Colenso we were certainly in a position which might be so described, and the Government would have been perfectly within their rights—if the law had been as they are now proposing to make it—in calling out the Volunteers.

MR. WYNDHAM was understood to dissent.

*MR. C. P. SCOTT: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. That means, I suppose, that the Government would not have done it. I am glad of that, but they would have been at perfect liberty to have done so. The effect of this change will be that instead of depending on the definite words of the Act we shall depend upon the good will of the Government, which is somewhat changeable, and the Volunteers themselves will never know exactly what are the obligations they undertake. If the change is applied in the manner suggested, I do not think it will make much difference; but if at any time the Government were in a tight place and called on the Volunteers—it would be then, after the Volunteers and the employers of Volunteers had had experience of the new condition under which these men would be called out for service—that the force must suffer in popularity, and this change be found to be a very grave one.

*MR. WYLIE (Dumbartonshire): As an old Scottish Volunteer, and still in close touch with the force, and with some of the most eminent and practical commanding officers, I wish to say a few words in support of this clause, the object of which is to render the volunteers more promptly available as an important portion of the great defensive forces of our country in any time of imminent national danger or great emergency, even if that emergency or danger does not amount to actual or apprehended invasion. I believe that recent events have proved the desirability of this measure. It is argued that the introduction of such a Bill is not opportune, and that if brought forward at all it should be in conjunction with some more important measure. But I think it is a most opportune, useful, and necessary measure, and one which will form a very valuable instalment of any complete scheme of re-organisation and reform, which I hope will be undertaken immediately after the present war, and with the light of the experience which that war has afforded us. Seeing that increased duties and responsibilities are to be placed on the Volunteers, it is natural that they and their friends should be anxious to know what increased encouragement and support the Government propose to give them. My opinion is that if the Government support the Volunteers, as we hope they will do, not only would the efficiency of the force be increased, but its numbers would be doubled, so that there might easily be a force of half a million ready to be promptly availed of in case of imminent national danger or great emergency, a large portion of whom would volunteer to serve in any part of the world, still leaving in this country for the legitimate purposes of home defence a very much larger number of Volunteers than are at present in existence. I give my cordial support to the clause now before the Committee.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I shall certainly support the omission of the clause. When the Under Secretary for War stated a few months ago the effect of the alteration of these words upon the course of any delicate diplomacy which might be in progress, I admit he struck a note which, if it had been a sound one, would have compelled me to vote against my hon. and gallant friend. The whole purport of the hon. Gentleman's remarks was that the effect of the alteration of these words would be to prevent something being regarded by a foreign Power as an act of war. I am quite unable to see that the difference in these words could possibly have that effect. If we were engaged in such delicate diplomacy I should be the last to turn that diplomacy into provocation; we have had quite enough of that. But what would be the actual effect? Under the present law, if the Volunteers were called out, a foreign Power would know it was because of an actual or apprehended invasion of some part of the United Kingdom. And if these words were deleted, and for them were substituted the words, "imminent national danger or great emergency," what difference could it possibly have upon the course of diplomatic negotiations with any foreign Power? Does the hon. Member mean to tell the Committee that trained diplomats would be so ignorant of the state of affairs that it would make the slightest difference to them what the words were which formed the basis on which the Volunteers were called out, so long as the words indicated national danger? We who are not regarded as being at all advocates of militarism have always differentiated between a force which, as the law stands, is a purely home defence force, a body of citizen soldiers, and the regular Army; and I confess that, much as I detest war, and militarism generally, anything in reason to make that voluntary arm more effective would have my support.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Then you ought to vote for this clause.

MR. MADDISON: The hon. and gallant Gentleman's dogmatism is so Mr. Wyllie.

common that it really has no market price now. The Under Secretary for War needs to be very cautious of the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield, because he represents the jingo section of the Volunteers of this country. That section is a very small portion of that great force; there are very few who have such great ambitions. The majority are mere citizens, and do not want to be anything else; they have no desire to become soldiers in all but name, they simply want to belong to a force whose one call upon them is the defence of their native land. I say, deliberately, that if the Under Secretary of State for War wants really to encourage volunteering, instead of tampering with the force, he should make it more and more clear that the members belong to a home defence force and that alone. The hon. and gallant Gentleman shakes his head; he, at any rate, is candid. But I am speaking of the great mass of the rank and file, the poor men—the Volunteers with wives and families—who are quite content to serve their country, and believe they are serving their country, although not treading a foreign strand, by making themselves effective, so that should occasion arise they may be prepared to defend their native land against invasion. But you do not even say "great national emergency." What do you mean by "great emergency"? I can conceive a state of affairs in which you might have an emergency which was not an emergency from outside at all, and I say deliberately, I will be no party to giving to a Minister, when Parliament is not sitting, the great power here proposed, and the duty of interpreting these words, seeing that the result might be of such serious moment to the working classes of this country. There is no need for this Bill so far as the effectiveness of the Volunteers is concerned. We who vote against this clause are not voting in any way against making the Volunteer force effective; we are voting to maintain the original and true character of the force, and to prevent it being placed in the hands of any foolish or possibly unscrupulous Minister, who might use it for a purpose foreign to that for which it was formed.

MR. WYNDHAM: May I correct a misapprehension under which the hon. Member has spoken? By the law of the and we cannot move Volunteers out of the country at all.

MR. MADDISON: I did not say otherwise. I can assure the hon. Gentleman I had no such thought in my mind.

MR. WYNDHAM: Then the hon. Member seemed to think that some great emergency of a social character might arise. We cannot use a Volunteer against the civil power.

COLONEL PILKINGTON: I should like to congratulate my hon. friend the Under Secretary—

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present. House counted, and forty Members being found present,

COLONEL PILKINGTON: I should very much like to say how much I congratulate the Government and my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War on the introduction of this Bill. It seems to me that Clause 1 is a clause which makes a valuable change which will be welcomed by the Volunteers. This is the opinion not only of Volunteer officers, but also of many men of business throughout the country who are not connected with Volunteers at all. They feel that these words are wanted in order to improve the scope of the Bill. Now, Sir, with regard to the new words, it seems to me that they are very much better than the old words, and may cover the old words, and as for supposing that they would be wrongly used by the Government, I think that any such remark or objection, when looked into carefully, entirely falls to the ground. It is not the War Office, but the Government of the day, and the Government of the day is the Cabinet which represents the majority of the House of Commons, and is it likely any Cabinet or Government that has behind it the House of Commons would be so foolish or rash as to do anything which in any way would be dangerous? What we find so generally in this kind of thing is that the Government, instead of being precipitate and rash, and instead of acting with great speed, the danger is that they generally act too slowly. With regard to almost all the military movements of whatever kind which have taken place for many years past, we have moved with very great care and very great wisdom, and very often with too much hesitation. I do not believe that there is any danger in the words proposed. On the contrary, I believe there is very great safety in them. In my opinion they have been long wanted, and I believe that no business man, Volunteer or otherwise, would object to the insertion of these words. I have for many years past believed that in Volunteer circles it was the opinion that some such words should be inserted. It has been urged that the insertion of such words would be distasteful to the Volunteers, and that they would not increase their number. I do not believe that for a moment. I think this will meet the views of Volunteers in great measure, and they will see something here is done which will make their force much more effective, and I will explain to the House why I think so in a few moments. The South African War must have added 50,000 at least new members to the force. In a regiment I know very well I know that the battalion has increased very much. I think that is a proof that the Volunteers, if they see danger to the country, will immediately rally to the country's cause, and come forward in greater numbers. I will give another instance of the effect on Volunteers. It was at one time said that fourteen days camping of Volunteers would create a great deal of enthusiasm.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is travelling beyond the limits of this clause. He must confine himself strictly to this clause.

COLONEL PILKINGTON: I accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I see the old words are "Actual or apprehended invasion." If the Government wait until an actual invasion begins before they call out the Volunteers, I say distinctly—knowing something of the Volunteers, and being a Volunteer officer—I think we should go simply to the shambles. I believe there would be confusion, and we should not know where we were or what we were doing. The foreign forces would be actually on our soil, probably in great numbers, and although it is very likely they would not get very much further because of the Line and Militia, we as a force should be no good at all. That is my opinion, and I will explain why I think so. We now find when we go into camp that it is only after a week's or a fortnight's drill that different battalions, as it were, begin to feel at home. After a few days or a fortnight we find ourselves far better than we were at the end of the first week. Wherever we are sent, at first we should be all at sea; we should not know the ground or the town. By degrees we should get accustomed to the surroundings, and it would be found then whether we were short of transport or not. In the camp in which I was this year for fourteen days, there were many things wanted. Perhaps the ammunition cart had got no horse, and—

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must ask the hon. Member to resume his seat when I rise. The hon. Member is now discussing the general training of Volunteers, which cannot now be raised.

*COLONEL PILKINGTON: I am trying to show that at least a month or six weeks training would be required to ensure some amount of efficiency among the Volunteers. But it does seem to me that it is too much to expect good results if the Volunteers were called out forty-eight hours after the invasion has begun. They could not be an efficient force under those circumstances, and it seems to me that if the War Office and the Government and the country are to rely upon the Volunteers for the home defence force—looking at the great numbers and the great part they fill in the forces—it is absolutely necessary that they should be afforded every opportunity for making themselves efficient, and be put in a position so that they may become acquainted with the position and be furnished with all the requisites and transport equipment, so that if the enemy comes up they may be well prepared to give a good account of themselves. It seems to me that the changes it is proposed to make are in the right direction. They would enable the Government to take time by the forelock and get the Volunteers in that position in which they might have to make a stand eventually. What the Volunteers wish is to be sufficiently efficient to be called out at the proper time and be ready for an invasion if it should come. I hope this change will be made, and that the clause at it stands, without Amendment, will be passed. I trust that the measure will become law this session.

Colonel Pilkington.

MR. CAWLEY (Lancashire, Prestwich) said he was afraid this clause, if passed, would have a very bad effect upon the Volunteers. He had listened to the remarks of several hon. Members, and he preferred the opinion of his hon. friend the Member for the Leigh Division in regard to the rank and file of Volunteers to that of the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield, who was an officer in the Volunteer service. He doubted whether the opinion of the Volunteers was so much in favour of the measure as it had been represented to be. For a commanding officer to merely summon the Volunteers before him and ask them whether they liked this change or not was not the correct way to arrive at their real opinions. He thought it was far more likely that the Volunteers would not be in favour of a change like this. A great many Volunteers came from small employers, and he could understand such employers not liking their clerks to be liable to be called out except in case of apprehended invasion. It seemed to him that this clause was placing a very great power in the hands of the particular Minister at any particular time. There was no doubt that the phrase "imminent national danger or great emergency" allowed a great deal of latitude, and it might be interpreted very differently by different Ministers at different times. On the other hand, the terms on which the Volunteers were elected at the present time were not at all ambiguous, for they all knew that they were only going to be called upon for active service in case their country was invaded. When the ordinary Volunteer came to read the terms of this clause which it was proposed to substitute, an ambiguity would be found about it which was not at all desirable, and which he thought would prevent a great many men enlisting in the service. Perhaps at the present moment this provision would not deter any men from joining, but when the war was over, and the people came to pay the bills which they would be called upon to pay, he thought it would discourage people from joining the Volunteers. He had not had the practical experience of the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield, although he had once had the privilege of being a full private, and he might say that his own experience did not coincide with the experience of the hon. and gallant Member posite who was a colonel in the Volunteers. He thought this provision was a very undesirable one, and unless the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill could give them a more practical and satisfactory explanation why this change was wanted he should certainly vote against the clause.

*MR. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk Burghs) believed that this Bill would increase the martial spirit amongst their Volunteers. Personally, when the Bill for the war was to be paid he had no fear of the result, and in case of an apprehended invasion or imminent national danger he believed that a large number of their Volunteers would be found ready to join not only in the defence of their country, but to go anywhere in the interests of their country. What had they found in the case of the invasion of British territory in South Africa? There a horde of undrilled peasants, fifty of whom could not march in line together, but who could shoot straight, had been able to oppose successfully the finest forces in the world. He thought this South African war had shown very forcibly the necessity of having a Volunteer force which would be ready to go anywhere and do anything at the call of duty. He heartily supported this measure, and he sincerely hoped that there would be appointed some person who would have charge of the Volunteer forces, for he should not like to hear of another mistake being made like the unfortunate instance of which the House was already aware.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) : The speech just delivered by the hon. Member does not help the Government very much, because practically what he says is wanted is a condition of things that will enable the Volunteers to be called out, and in his own words, "to go anywhere and do anything."

*MR. JOHN WILSON : I did not say I wanted such a state of things to arise. What I said was that if such a condition of things arose the Volunteers would be found ready and willing to go anywhere and do anything.

MR. JOHN BURNS : But if these men are so anxious to defend their country, they only need to go down to the recruiting sergeant, and then they can share the honour and distinction of going to South Africa by enlisting like the ordinary soldier, who at this moment is so pluckily doing his work. I have been out just now to the Vote Office, and what do I find? I find that we have five Bills, all of which are significant of the spirit of militarism that is being introduced into this country at this particular moment. We have a Bill for the Volunteers, one for the Reserve Forces, one for the Military Manœuvres, the Military Lands Bill, and the Naval Reserve Bill, and every one of these Bills seeks to extend the power which the Government now has for giving more men to the Reserve, and calling them out at the discretion of the Admiralty. These measures give the Government more latitude and discretion in mobilising the Naval Reserves than they have hitherto had. With regard to the Military Lands Bill, we see a military spirit pervading that measure, and military lands are to be placed at the discretion of the War Office, and it is proposed to give commanding officers power to close roads and to do other things. Then we have the Reserve Forces Bill, which gives the War Office similar powers in relation to the Reserve forces. I think the whole of these Bills are symptomatic of an attempt to rush through the House of Commons in the emergency of the war with South Africa a series of measures to convert the Volunteer force into the Militia force or something like a conscript force under conscript conditions. I object to this Volunteers Bill, notwithstanding the fact that the Under Secretary for War has deleted Sub-section (b) of Clause 2, and I do so on the ground that if you allow the War Office to determine without confirmation of this House what an imminent national danger or a great emergency is, we shall probably see a further development of what we have quite recently witnessed—namely, the Volunteers being moved forward to the Militia stage, the Militia moved to the Army Reserve stage, the Army Reserves moved forward to the Regular Army, and the Indian Army again brought into Europe, and the Regular Army depleted at home to go abroad. The Volunteers, under the phrase "imminent national danger or great emergency," could be called upon to strengthen the depleted garrisons of the Regular Army, and they could be called out for purposes which under the present law would not be legal. I protest against that. I object by a side wind or by any other patriotic subterfuge to convert what is a voluntary force into what is a more or less compulsory force at the discretion of the War Office. If this Bill is passed with this phrase, "imminent national danger or great emergency," you will change the character of the Volunteer army, which is at present well understood by the Volunteers, who joined under well-known conditions, and who do not object to be summoned when there is actual or apprehended invasion. You will damage the Volunteers as part of our national defence, and will convert that force into a more or less compulsory force, probably for service abroad. What is a "great emergency"? The Emperor of Germany, a few years ago, made his celebrated "mailed fist" speech. This country seemed to have lost its head over it. They took a great deal too much notice of the German Emperor, and more notice of him on that occasion than I would take of his utterances on any occasion. They called out the Flying Squadron, which was not out as soon as it ought to have been, and not quite as efficient as it ought to have been, considering the money spent on the Navy. It was called out in answer to the "mailed fist" speech of the Emperor. Under the Volunteer Act you could not have construed that speech as an imminent national danger or great emergency. But if this Bill is passed and the German Emperor makes another "mailed fist" speech, you will have the Flying Squadron called out again, supplemented by the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield calling the Queen's Westminsters together and saying, "Here is the German Emperor making another 'mailed fist' speech. Let us under the new Act appeal to the War Office to interpret it as an imminent national danger or great emergency, and then the Act may be put into operation." That is to happen whenever a tinpot European monarch makes a speech which cannot possibly harm England, and who has not a Navy equal to a tenth of our Navy. The whale and the elephant rarely come into collision. Under this Bill gentlemen like the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield will be petitioning the War Office to call out the Volunteers. I do not think this Bill is wanted. What is more, you will let the Volunteers think, by the passing of this Bill, that they are to be subject to the discretion of the War Office. I would not trust much to the discretion of the War Office. They have bungled in South Africa; they make a mess of nearly everything they take in hand, and if they have this Bill they will have power to do with the Volunteers what they did with the whole military arrangements in South Africa. I am not prepared to give a War Office such as our discretionary power of calling out the Volunteers when in its opinion a great emergency has arisen. If the War Office had done their duty, the necessity of discussing this Bill would not have arisen at all. If the Army had been in a state of efficiency, as it ought to have been, considering the amount of money voted for it, we should not be called upon to discuss this Bill at all. Then we are asked to spoil the Volunteer force—for that is what it means—because the War Office have not acted efficiently. Immediately the Volunteers recognise you are tampering with free voluntary enlistment, and that they are to be put under the discretionary powers of Lord Lansdowne, then the Volunteer army will disappear like butter in the sun. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite says that the Volunteers like it. Where is the proof? What Volunteer corps has been brought together and had the terms of this Bill submitted to them? Has a plébiscite been taken of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's own regiment? I have ten times as many of the Queen's Westminsters living in my constituency as the hon. Member has.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I am willing to meet you in your constituency.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I will not take the trouble to meet the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The Queen's Westminster are efficient Volunteers, and they want to remain Volunteers. They do not want to listen to a lot of prancing patriots, whose idea of the Volunteer force is that every man in England who is not a soldier or a sailor should be a marine. I can assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that in his zeal to improve the Volunteers as a defensive force he is going the wrong way about it, and that if the Volunteers are placed under the discretion of the War Office, men will refuse to join, and the Volunteers will suffer in number, in esprit de corps, and in efficiency, and they will refuse to be converted from a practically voluntary force into a more or less conscriptive force. It is because this Bill is one of a series of militarizing enactments, which has for its object a conscript Militia, and the making of a free Volunteer Army into a more or less conscriptive force, and because the Volunteers will be sadly damaged in efficiency and numbers, that I protest against it. I come to one of my last points. The political atmosphere just now is charged with everything of a military character. We see hon. and gallant Gentlemen like the Member for Central Sheffield and the members of town councils asking, in a fever of panic, that the police should be armed. They want rifle ranges here, there, and everywhere, and they want the Volunteers converted into a conscriptive force. The militarization of English public life is going on to an extent that would be absolutely unnecessary if the War Office did its work properly, and if the Army and Navy were looked after to the extent they should be. It is because this Bill is one more link in the chain of jingoising England that I protest against it. If the Volunteers in my own constituency are in favour of this Bill, I have received no evidence of it. I do not believe that there is one Volunteer in a thousand who knows of the existence of this measure, or who has considered its terms with his comrades. It is because I believe the Bill is intended to place the Volunteers under the discretion of the War Office, and to enable them to be called up at any time for service both at home and abroad, that I am opposed to it. I oppose it also because I have a greater regard for the Volunteer force than the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield, who has the most unfortunate knack of doing the right thing in the wrong way, and of going about a good thing in a way which ultimately defeats his purpose. I intend challenging a division upon this Bill, which I believe to be unnecessary.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: There is one point which does not seem to have been cleared up in the discussion. It is most difficult to get the critics and the advocates of this particular clause together. My hon. friend who has just spoken has referred to the increased liability of service which the Bill undoubtedly imposes on the Volunteer force. The reply made to that is that the Volunteers are patriotic, that the present emergency has shown there is need for their services, and that therefore this Bill is justified. It seems to me that that does not meet the point at all. If it is said that the present emergency has shown that the Volunteers have come forward, that is in itself a condemnation of this measure, because it is perfectly clear that there is now an ample outlet for the patriotic spirit of the Volunteers. My contention is that the present law is sufficient. The Under Secretary for War has referred to the undesirability of issuing a proclamation while negotiations are going on, but does anybody mean to contend that no steps would be taken for the defence of this country or the assertion of its power until we found it necessary to call out the Volunteers? Under the present law, whenever an order is in force for the embodiment of the Militia the Government can accept the services of the Volunteers. At the present time such an order is in force, and the argument that the issue of a proclamation would render the negotiations difficult seems to have no weight whatever. For instance, a proclamation is necessary to call out the Army Reserve, and another to call out the Militia, and in such a case Parliament must meet, if it is not sitting, ten days after the proclamation is issued, and it cannot be supposed that the situation would be rendered more intense by calling out the Volunteers. That is an argument that will not hold water. The second argument of the Under Secretary is that it might be necessary that certain particular garrisons should be manned on certain particular occasions, but surely the present situation has shown there would not be the slightest difficulty in appealing to the patriotic spirit of the Volunteers in order to obtain a sufficient number. I should like to ask the Under Secretary for War if he would state explicitly how far the present powers fall short of the powers proposed in this Bill. This Bill really means a good deal, or it means nothing at all. If it means nothing at all except a mere change of words, then I think it is a great pity that the Government should have put us to the inconvenience of discussing it at this period of the session. If it means a great deal, the Committee have a right to know all it does mean.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Captain Sinclair and Mr.
Humphreys-Owen.

Captain Sinclair.

Clause 2 :—

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR said that there was nothing definite in the clause. What was urged with regard to this particular provision was that before "actual or apprehended invasion" was the condition of things the Government might call upon volunteer artillery to garrison certain forts or outlying places, but it was not definitely stated. Therefore he wished, in order to limit the clause, to insert after the word "Volunteer" the words "garrison artillery."

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 10, after 'Volunteer,' to insert 'garrison artillery.'"—(Captain Sinclair.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'garrison artillery' be there inserted."

MR. JOHN BURNS said before the Under Secretary replied he would like to know by what method these men were to be paid for their services. He put the question for the reason that he did not want a Volunteer to be coerced, or, to use a more expressive phrase, to be bluffed by his colonel into consenting to enlistment—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The only question now before the Committee is whether this clause shall be limited to garrison artillery or not.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am afraid that the hon. and gallant Member for Forfar has not quite correctly apprehended what I said the other day, although what he has just said does very nearly cover the whole purpose we contemplate. I think the language I used was that we only contemplated putting garrisons into forts in any estuary leading up to a harbour. Those garrisons, or 99 per cent. of them, are composed of garrison artillery, but there are some other Volunteers required—three or four bicyclists, for instance—to carry on communications between the fort and the rear. Under the scheme of defence as it at present exists, we require about 7,500 men in order to give requisite garrisons to the forts which have been constructed in the Mersey, at Bristol, in the Tyne and the Clyde. These garrisons are almost all composed of garrison artillery, but there must necessarily be some submarine miners and engineers. These garrisons would only go to their posts for drill on frequent occasions, but these things cannot be left to mere chance. The very worst preparation for war is to issue an appeal at the last moment. It is far better that a force of 7,500 men out of a force of 250,000 who are prepared to qualify for these posts should be allowed to register their names in times of peace. I cannot go back from that view. There is no danger of any sort or kind, and the fears with which hon. Members are haunted are so illusory that I find it hard to believe their arguments are serious. It appears to be a deliberate attempt to play at the game, that we are living in the eighteenth century instead of in the dawn of the twentieth. These forts have been built and armed, and these men ask to be allowed to form part of the garrisons, and we ask that they shall be allowed to do so. The proposition is so reasonable that I do not think I am justified in further occupying the time of the House by labouring the point.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: When this matter was before the House on the Second Reading, it was pointed out, and I thought there was a great deal in the proposition made, that instead of extending this to the whole 250,000 men it should be confined to the 7,500 you require. Supposing you are going to man the forts on the Tyne, surely you are not going to Cornwall to get men?

MR. WYNDHAM: The object of the clause is to make it definite instead of allowing it to remain indefinite. We should only take the men from the immediate districts.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Then I have no objection to it myself. I think that is a reasonable suggestion. These men would be in a very much better position to discharge their duties if they knew them some time in advance; but if this is to make it definite I cannot conceive anything more indefinite than the words in the Bill.

MR. WYNDHAM: I propose to move an Amendment which entirely meets that objection.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Amendment of the hon. Member does meet it to some extent, but I should have thought some method might be adopted by which the liability should not be put upon the whole force, but on that smaller part consisting of artillery and submarine miners and engineers who are concerned in the matter. I should have thought it better to define it than have it in this indefinite form.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Then, I suppose, when a new fort was built we should have to have a fresh Bill.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Not at all; it could be done by a new rule.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) did not consider the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman was at all unreasonable, and he hoped that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary would see his way to adopt it. He did not think that this liability should extend to the whole of the Volunteers. This Bill had created a great deal of alarm on account of the extreme ambiguity of its language. He merely mentioned the fact in the hope that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary would bring forward an Amendment limiting the total number of those who should be asked to offer themselves.

MR. WYNDHAM: The difference between us is not wide, and it appears the difficulty of the situation is to define the intentions of the Government without introducing definitions which might be inconvenient. If I were expected to put all the places in the Bill, I should have to say where all the forts are. If I were asked to put down the number of garrisons, I could say exactly how many men we should require; but a new improvement in the next six months might so alter the conditions that we should have to come here again for more. There is really no danger of any Government being so insane as to try and place all the Volunteers under an obligation of this character. All we ask is that, when money has been spent on the forts, and when there are corps who are to man these forts in time of war in the neighbourhood of these various forts, we should be allowed to select them in time of peace. Unless the Leader of the Opposition thinks that some benefit could be achieved by putting a limit on the number, that is the only way the object could be achieved. But as all these fears are illusory, there is no reason for doing so. I think the House and the country in this matter might well trust this and successive Governments.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is not a question of trust or distrust of the Government. It is a question of the disturbing effect this wide suggestion has on the Volunteer force generally. The words are "to accept the offer of any member of a Volunteer corps to subject himself." I do not know whether it would not be better to say, accept the offer of a certain number of the Volunteer forces, and to then accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Forfarshire. We are both aiming at the same thing.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes. But the word "any" does not mean "all."

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It means from certain corps; but I should be very sorry if a Bill in Parliament named the whole of those corps. Nobody has suggested that, and I was only trying to meet the hon. Gentleman by indicating a manner in which the question might be supervised and so safeguarded.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire) suggested that as all were agreed upon the principle, instead of taking the discussion on the words now before the House, they should substitute the words "to be called out for coast defence and garrison duty."

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.) asked whether the hon. Gentleman could not accept an Amendment to the effect that those called up "shall not exceed 10,000 in all."

MR. WYNDHAM: I could not accept that Amendment. If any hon. Gentleman desires to limit the clause I will try and meet him, but any attempt to try and extract the name of a corps or fort I cannot consent to.

MR. MADDISON did not think there was any Bill in which the intentions of the Government were disclosed so little as in this clause. As there was a perfect agreement as to the principle of the clause, gested that the obligation lay upon the hon. Gentleman to add words that would carry out what the House intended. If the clause could be restricted in the manner suggested by the right hon. gentleman the Leader of the Opposition there would be no objection to the

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.

But he was not prepared to support the doctrine of a sort of Ministerial liability.

MR. JAMESON (Clare, W.) agreed to the Amendment. The Under-Secretary had intimated that if the clause was framed in this way it was not business; garrison artillery were quite different to other branches of Volunteers. He had 20 years in the Regulars and twelve in Volunteer forces, and if a vote of confidence was taken upon this proposal which was distinctly contrary to the law in force, it would be seen that he did not approve of the action of the Government. The artilleryman took a longer time to train than the infantryman, and if there was anything peculiarly businesslike in this business, it was the proceedings of the Government. Had the Government reflected for a moment what his proposal meant to the Volunteer? What did the Government propose to give in return? Did they propose to exempt them from certain taxes, or from jury service, or some other unpleasant thing for a citizen?—

CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. gentleman is travelling a very long way from the Amendment.

MR. JAMESON said that with regard to the artillery, the men should have what obligations they took upon themselves when they joined; but in any case the Government had no right to go to the whole Volunteer force and say it was necessary for them, if they came forward, to come within the operation of the clause, for the reason that, like the Regulars, the Volunteers did not care to see one going and another left behind because of his home or business ties.

MR. COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, Bootle) expressed his opinion that the Amendment for the provision of the Volunteers who were stationed at certain forts was a good one, and that the men who should undertake that should be garrison artillery, and he thought that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary would see his way to accept the Amendment to that effect proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, which he (Colonel Sandys) intended to support.

MR. WYNDHAM said the majority would be garrison artillery. He did not trust his own judgment in this matter, and though the majority would be garrison artillery, still there necessarily would have to be others. It might be necessary, for instance, to have fifteen men on Brighton pier for the purposes of communications, and it was in matters of that kind that the Government ought not to be called upon to specify their requirements. They ought not to specify the particular composition of the garrisons. The only limitation could be a limitation of numbers; if that was pressed, he saw no means of resisting it.

SIR. H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN expressed a fear that he had not been clearly apprehended. He objected to a limited number, as he did not see that it would be of any service, because the only result would be that another Bill might have to be introduced in a very short time. What he desired to see was the clause restricted to the particular class of Volunteers who would be invited to undertake these duties. If the words "garrison artillery, submarine miners, and others necessary for coast defence," were incorporated, they would very nearly meet the objections raised.

MR. BUCHANAN desired to supplement the words of the right hon. Gentleman. He moved after the words "garrison artillery" in the proposed Amendment to add the words "submarine miners, engineers, and other forces for coast defence." That would include telegraphists, cyclists, and other people whom the Government desired to have; he thought such an Amendment as that would emphasise what was intended to be carried out.

*MR. COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, Ince) said he wished to keep the Volunteer force as it was, and was glad that the Under Secretary had withdrawn the registration for service in the field and abroad. He thought the Amendment would cripple our power at a time when we most wanted the use of force. He should like to see steps taken to prevent regimental pressure from being brought to bear on the Volunteers—even with regard to service at home.

MAJOR JAMESON said he thoroughly agreed with the Amendment. The hon. Member opposite proposed this limit in order that those who volunteered might not appear in a different light from their comrades.

*MR. WYLIE hoped that his hon. friend the Under Secretary of State for War would adhere to the exact terms he had proposed in connection with this clause. He did not think it could do any harm to give the whole of the Volunteers the option of being called out for service at any time.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN said there was an agreement in principle on both sides, and they were only now discussing how they could give effect to the general consensus of the House. He had handed in an Amendment, and he hoped that it might not be displaying undue partiality to say he thought it was better than that of his hon. friend the Member for Forfarshire. It was to add to sub-section (a), after the words, "military service," the words, "for coast defence duty." He hoped that the Under Secretary for War would adhere to the understanding that the whole body of Volunteers would not be called out for military duty at any time, but only those men intended to garrison forts.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR asked leave to withdraw his Amendment. He could bring it up again on the Amendment of his hon. friend after the Under Secretary had had time to consider the proposal.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said he hoped the Under Secretary would undertake to satisfy the scruples of hon. Members on that side of the House by introducing either now or later words which would limit the clause.

MR. WYNDHAM hoped that the Committee would be induced to advance a little further in the direction he had indicated in his Amendment. The Committee appeared to be on the eve of arriving at an agreement. He would undertake to amend his subsequent Amendment before Report by specifying the places more clearly—not by enumeration, but by some description, or whatever might be possible.

Mr. Buchanan's Amendment to the Amendment was, by leave, withdrawn, and the Amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WYNDHAM moved to amend Clause 2 so that it should read as follows—

"It shall be lawful for Her Majesty to accept the offer of any member of a Volunteer corps to subject himself to the liability to be called out for actual military service at any time at such places in Great Britain as may be specified in his agreement."

He undertook before Report to bring up words which would specify the nature of those places more clearly than was now apparent from the words, and to make clear what had been their intention all along.

Amendment agreed to.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness) said his hon. friend had altered his position so much since the Second Reading that the whole character of the Bill was altered. He had given notice of an Amendment to carry out the view that they should take advantage of the services of Volunteers who were willing to take upon themselves active military service generally and for all purposes. As the hon. Gentleman had accepted the limitation imposed on him by the other side of the House, he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 10, to leave out from second 'to' to end of line 14, and insert 'the liability to be called out for actual military service at any time at such places in Great Britain as may be specified in his agreement.'"—(Mr. Wyndham.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. WYNDHAM said it was necessary to amend Clause 2 in order to ensure that officers should obtain the pensions and allowances which were provided for in the Volunteer Act of 1863.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, lines 17 and 18, to leave out 'and eighteen,' and insert 'to twenty.'"

Amendment agreed to.

Consequential Amendment made.

BUCHANAN moved a proviso to effect that regulations made under section 2 should not come into effect until they had lain four weeks upon the Table.

The alterations of the law which be effected by the Bill were of such substantial character that the regulations not become legally binding unless they were laid on the Table of the House and submitted to the judgment of Parliament.

Amendment proposed—

Page 1, line 19, at the end, to add the words: "Provided always that regulations made under this section shall not come into effect until they have lain four weeks upon the Table of the House of Parliament whilst that House is sitting."—(Mr. Buchanan.)

Amendment proposed, "That those words be added."

WYNDHAM said the hon. Member was labouring under a misapprehension. Nothing was being proposed which was beyond present powers.

MR. BUCHANAN said power was given to issue regulations which would have the effect of law.

MR. WYNDHAM said the sub-section simply enabled the Secretary of State to adapt Part 2 of the Volunteer Act of 1863 to the new conditions. That was not a matter which would be laid before the House. With all respect, the hon. Member was not Parliamentary draftsman to the War Office.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR said it was a reasonable thing to suggest that if the Secretary for War was to have the power of varying the regulations applicable to the Volunteer force, the House should have some opportunity of expressing an opinion on them.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Sir William Walrond and
 Mr. Anstruther.

Question proposed, "That Clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: If anything could justify the opposition we have offered to this Bill as a whole, it is the present condition of this clause. As a matter of fact, as originally introduced, the clause gave the Government power to accept the services of all Volunteers who agreed to serve in any part of the world. That meant imposing an additional liability of a very serious character on the whole of the Volunteer service. The result of the criticism to which the Bill has been subjected is that the character of the Bill has been completely changed. There is now no question of foreign service, and the application of the Bill, instead of being general with the whole Volunteer service, is to be limited. It is not too much to say that the case for the Bill has entirely broken down, and the opposition to the measure has served a most useful purpose and justified itself by the result. I regret that the Government, seeing that the limits of the Bill are so small, has not consented to acquiesce in the very general desire that any increase in the liabilities cast on the Volunteers should be deferred until the matter could be considered more dispassionately and under normal conditions.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I wish to emphasise the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Ince with regard to the method in which Volunteers offer their services. I would submit to the Under Secretary for War that in the regulations putting this Bill into operation the same conditions should apply as in the case of transfers from one regiment to another in the Regular Army. The hon. Gentleman knows that when Volunteers are asked for from, say, the 3rd Buffs, to enlist into, say, the East Surrey Regiment for the purpose of going, say, to India, what happens is that the colonel neither of the 3rd Buffs nor of the East Surrey, but of some other regiment, sits upon a day specified to receive the enlistments from the one regiment to the other. By that means you get impartiality, and the men volunteer of their own volition and without any pressure from their own colonel. What is good enough for the regular army ought to be good enough for the Volunteer regiments, and if the method adopted in the regular army is resorted to, we should not find Volunteers subjected to the invidious distinction to which many have been in connection with the South African war. I appeal to the hon. Gentleman that in the regulations which are issued he will follow the method laid down in the regular army.

Question put and agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

On the question that the Bill, as amended, be reported,

MR. JOHN BURNS asked that the point he had just raised might be replied to by the Under Secretary of State for War, as it was a matter of vital importance to the successful working of the Bill.

MR. WYNDHAM: I think I have given the hon. Member a general assurance not only that there will be no pressure, but that no need for pressure can possibly arise. I will, however, consider whether any specified course can be taken, but I cannot pledge myself to apply to the one force a method which may not be applicable to that force, while it may be to the other.

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

RESERVE FORCES BILL [Lords].
Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith, in the Chair.]

Clause 1 :—

MR. BUCHANAN had on the Paper an Amendment to insert the following proviso—

"Provided always, that men in the second division liable to be called out under this section shall receive not less Army reserve pay than that received by men of the first division."

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire is out of order, because it would impose a fresh charge upon the taxpayer.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. BUCHANAN said that it would be somewhat hard if the men upon whom these new obligations were to be placed did not enjoy the same position and pay as those who constituted the first division and the Army Reserve. He, therefore, asked the Under Secretary of State to give an assurance that these men should receive the same remuneration as those upon whom the obligations at present rested.

MR. WYNDHAM: I can give the assurance asked for. I can even say that in the Supplementary Estimates, which I hope to introduce on Friday, a small sum will be allocated to meet the limited number of cases which are likely to accrue this year.

MR. BUCHANAN: It will not be necessary to put a provision in the Bill, I suppose?

MR. WYNDHAM: No.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2 :—

MR. WYNDHAM: I must move the Amendment on the Paper, although the necessity of it may seem a little in conflict with what I have just said. But there is a necessity, because in the Act to be amended the pay is laid down, and therefore, as we are amending the Act, it is necessary to put in these words in order to secure the proper pay.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 7, after 'and,' to add '(d) if under the foregoing provisions the rank of any such man in the Militia is raised or reduced above or below that which he held before he entered on permanent service his pay shall be correspondingly raised or reduced.'"—(Mr. Wyndham.)

Amendment agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill reported, with the Amendment; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

NAVAL RESERVE BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square), who, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, was very indistinctly heard, was understood to explain that the object of the Bill was to attract to the new division of the Naval Reserve men of twelve years service who hitherto had not been induced to join the Royal Naval Reserve. The Admiralty attached great value to this additional reserve, as it was hoped to obtain men of higher position, who would be able to fill the posts of chief petty officers and petty officers in the Royal Naval Reserve, and so release a number of Regular officers at present occupied with those duties. These men would get sixpence per day as a retainer. It was also proposed to reorganise the present Seamen Pensioner Reserve. This was a simple Bill, but it was believed it would provide a large additional force.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Goschen.)

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There are one or two points which occur to me. I gather that this new Reserve will not be amalgamated with the Royal Naval Reserve.

MR. GOSCHEN : No.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : It will be left separate ?

MR. GOSCHEN : Yes.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There is one other question I wish to ask. Is there any limit of age or limit of service proposed ? The words are "who have served." Is any standard of service required ?

MR. GOSCHEN said there would be none over fifty years of age. There were many officers filling the position of chief petty officers who would be set free for active service, and it was hoped that greater efficiency of the Reserve would be secured.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : But is there any limit to the time which may have elapsed since their service in the Navy ? Obviously a man who served when a boy would at the age of fifty-five have very little trace of the Navy left in him.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (MR. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.) : Three years.

Mr. Goschen.

MR. JOHN BURNS : I trust the House will notice the significant language in the Memorandum to this Bill, and also the statement of the First Lord himself. I was greatly surprised to hear that experience has shown that few men who have served in the Navy join the present Naval Reserve, which now consists mainly of seamen of the mercantile marine and fishermen. The First Lord seems to be under the impression that he can get over this condition of things by offering to men who do not now join 6d. per day to join the Naval Reserve. Such a scheme will not overcome the prejudice of time-expired men against joining the Reserve. The First Lord in some respects is a man of sanguine temperament, but I do not believe he will get 15,000 men in the Naval Reserve for a retainer of 6d. per day. It is indeed significant that we should be told that the Royal Naval Reserve is so unpopular that the men will not join it. Is it due to the fact that when a sailor has done his twelve years in the Navy he has had enough of it, that he is disgusted with it to such an extent that he does not want to have anything more to do with it for the rest of his life ? If that be so, it indicates that the conditions of employment in the Navy are so unattractive that the sailor views with pleasure the opportunity of ceasing all connection with the Navy at the expiration of his twelve years. I would suggest that instead of offering this retainer of 6d. per day for 15,000 men the right hon. Gentleman should consider the advisability of making the Navy during the twelve years service more popular by adding the sixpence per day to the pay of the sailor, thus increasing the interest of the men in the service while they are members of it, and perhaps stimulating among them a greater love for the Reserve when they leave the active ranks. I shall be glad to hear that there is some reason other than those I have suggested for the men not joining the Reserve, but I shall be agreeably surprised if at the end of twelve months, as a result of this sixpence per day retainer, the First Lord has more than 300 or 400 additional men in the Reserve. It appears to me that the condition of things is getting so unsatisfactory and intolerable, that when once a man has left the active ranks he is only too glad to have nothing to do with the Reserve.

MR. GOSCHEN, speaking by the indulgence of the House, said that the fact that the great majority of men continued from their twelve years service to the twenty-two years service proved that the service was not unpopular. The reason they did not join the Royal Naval Reserve was that they knew all the work of the Reserve, they knew all the drill, and there was a reluctance on their part to go through drills and so on, which were intended rather for recruits and men who had not been through the training that sailors of the Navy had. Inquiries had been made as to the probable success of the proposal, and it was understood that this offer would be an attraction to men who had left the service. It was not expected that the 15,000 men would be obtained at once. The 15,000 was the limit, and it was hoped that it would be reached in a certain number of years.

COMMANDER BETHELL: We have never yet made any efforts to secure the twelve years service men. Several times it has been suggested in Committee that something might be done to get these men back to the Reserve, but this is the first Bill ever placed before the House with that object. That my hon. friend is mistaken in his view about the popularity of the Navy is, I think, proved by the fact that such a very large proportion of the men, when their twelve years service expires, are only too anxious to serve the remaining term for a pension.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

COLONIAL STOCK BILL [Lords].

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.) said it had been the custom for many years to empower trustees in this country to invest in colonial stock, but the colonies had long desired that the power should exist where it was not specifically given in settlements. The matter required and had received a great deal of consideration, and it seemed to the Government that the proper basis on which to deal with it was that there should be some sort of security to trustees that the colonies would maintain good faith with their creditors, that they would respond to any judgment of the courts in this country, and would come under the limitations of the Colonial Stock Acts, thus differentiating colonial stock from foreign stock, which, of course, was not subject to Parliament, the courts of this country, or the action of the Government. Therefore, this Bill, in the case of trust money where there was no special authority to invest in colonial stock, would enable trustees to make such an investment, provided the colony concerned came under certain conditions to be laid down by the Treasury. Those conditions would be, in the first place, that the colony should thoroughly accept the legal position, that any legislation on its part detracting from or interfering with the security of its creditors would be properly vetoed by the Imperial Government; in the second place, that their stock should be brought under the regulations of the Colonial Stock Acts of this country; and thirdly, that the colony should provide from its own revenue for the satisfaction of any judgment of the courts given against it in the United Kingdom. Further, that the colony shall provide funds in the hands of an agent or firm of high standing and position here for that purpose. These conditions would be laid down by the Treasury, and would have to be assented to by any colony coming under the Bill. An arrangement had been come to with the Dominion of Canada, and colonial legislation had been passed for the fulfilment of these conditions, and a similar course would be pursued by any colony desiring to come under the Bill. In Committee he hoped to meet a suggestion that public notice should be given whereby trustees in this country might know the colonies in whose stock they might safely invest. He was quite sure all of them would be ready to do anything they could for the welfare of their colonial fellow subjects. He did not think he needed to say anything more, and he hoped the House would give the Bill a Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire): So far as this Bill proposes to extend the scope of those securities in which trustees may invest in Colonial stocks, it is a useful measure, but in so far as it relates to giving control to the Treasury, although it is comparatively small, I dislike it. It has been a tradition on the part of the Treasury—not in the time of the right hon. Gentleman, for this is a tradition which he has inherited from his predecessors—that it is their duty to take care of trustees not only in connection with Colonial stock but with every sort of investments. The policy of the Treasury has been systematically to prescribe the limits within which trustees may invest to an extent, which has not only proved a great embarrassment to trustees, but which has very much restricted the scope of what I think was a much better system. This Bill proposes to extend the scope of colonial investments in which trustees may invest, and so far this Bill is good. But what I very much demur to is the extent to which the Treasury is made the judge in this matter under this Bill, which I consider is the extension of a bad principle. How can the Treasury usefully supervise the conditions under which Colonial stock is to be deemed good or bad? It is all very easy in case of first-class colonies from a trustees' point of view, but when you come to deal with other Colonial stock what does this Bill hold out? On the one hand there is the Treasury and on the other hand the trustees, who, I think, would be able to form a much more reliable judgment than the Treasury. I do not think we shall get a satisfactory condition of trustee investments until the trustees are allowed to judge for themselves. I demur altogether to this guardianship of trustees by the Treasury, even under the right hon. Gentleman, who is one of the most sympathetic Chancellors of the Exchequer towards trustees. Even if this Bill were a larger measure I should take the sense of the House upon it, because I object to the principle of control by the Treasury which underlies it.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said that with all respect to the views expressed by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down he thought this Bill would be welcomed not only by the Colonies but also by the trustees. The imprimatur of the Treasury, in his opinion, enhanced and safeguarded the value of Colonial stock.

MR. CALDWELL said he was sorry that a Bill of this importance should be brought forward at such a late period of the session. It had only recently come down from the House of Lords, and the House was asked to pass it without the opinion of the various legal bodies in the country being expressed upon it. The Bill applied to Scotland as well as to England, and so far as legislation of this kind was concerned the legal bodies in Scotland had always taken very great pains to furnish Scotch Members with reports upon Bills like this which were of such a technical character. On the present occasion they had had no opportunity whatever of communicating with those legal bodies or of obtaining their reports. This placed Scotch Members under a considerable disadvantage. Clause 1 made a very considerable change in the law, of which they had had no explanation. It proposed that—

“For the purpose of enabling the Colonial Stock Acts, 1877 and 1892, to be applied to stock issued before the passing of this Act, it shall not be necessary that any prospectus, notice, stock certificate, coupon, dividend warrant, or other certificate or document issued before the passing of this Act in relation to the stock should state the particulars required to be stated therein by Section 19, of the Colonial Stock Act, 1877.”

The Act of 1877 laid down most distinctly that the revenues of the colony were liable, and not the Consolidated Fund of Her Majesty's Treasury. He could quite understand how they might bring in the case of Canada, where the stock, although practically the same, were not identically similar. In 1892 the same question occurred about the giving of a certain amount of relief, and Section 19 of the Act of that year provided that the provisions of the Colonial Stock Act, 1877, should not apply to any stock in respect to which the provisions of that section had not been observed before the passing of the Act. That was a very reasonable provision in the Act of 1892. With regard to investments by trustees he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going a little too far by declaring that the trustees should be at liberty to invest in Colonial stock subject to certain conditions laid down by the Treasury. He thought it would be better to have Colonial stock put on a proper legal footing. How were the trustees to know whether the conditions of the Treasury had been complied with or not? It was provided in the Bill that they should be set forth in the London Gazette, but he wondered how many people read the London Gazette to ascertain what had been published there. But, supposing they read the London Gazette, how would they know that the conditions had been complied with? He thought those conditions should be put into the Act of Parliament, and a certificate should be required that those conditions had been fulfilled in the case of certain stock. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would examine the Colonial Stock Acts of 1877 and 1892 he would find that they provided for a register in this country. At any rate the Bill requires considerable care in its preparation, and he thought the House would agree with him that an important question of this kind ought not to be rushed through the House at this period of the session without very careful consideration. It was important that the legal bodies in England and Scotland should have an opportunity of considering this measure.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Scotland will be able to do the same thing under this Bill as she is able to do at present under the authority of the Courts.

MR. CALDWELL said he had not looked up the point, and he did not profess to carry the Act of Parliament in his head. He did not know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer had had his attention drawn to Section 15 of the Act of 1877. It was now proposed to repeal that section, although the law at the present moment provided that the transaction should be entered upon the register. Was it not a very strange thing, when making any alteration in the law, that they should give power to trustees to invest money in Colonial stock, when, according to the law, no trust could be entered on the register? If trustees were to be allowed to invest in Colonial stock, then by all means that stock should be inscribed upon the register. Under these circumstances he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give a little more time for the consideration of this Bill. This was not a party measure at all, and there was nothing contentious about it, but he thought the conditions imposed by the Treasury ought to have the judgment of the House pronounced upon them. He did not think that a matter of this kind ought to be left entirely to regulations to be drawn up by the Treasury. He did not agree with his hon. and learned friend the Member for Haddington that this was a matter for the judges. He believed it was a matter for the Treasury and for the House, and he thought they ought to know what conditions the Treasury were going to impose.

MR. LOWLES (Shoreditch, Haggerston) thought the measure would be very warmly welcomed by all the colonies.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I am entirely in accord with the principle of this Bill, but I am bound to say that I see some force in the objection raised by my hon. and learned friend. I have the good fortune, or the misfortune, of being a trustee of several marriage settlements, and I am bound to say that I think this Bill throws very great difficulties in the way of those who are trustees. Looking at this Bill as a trustee I should not be inclined to invest trust money for which I am responsible in Colonial stock, because the Bill is so complicated. The measure is another instance of legislation by reference of which we have far too much in this House. The measure gives power to the Treasury to make certain rules to be published in the London Gazette, but it is so complicated that I am afraid it will not facilitate very much the investment of trust money in Colonial stock. I think it would be better to introduce a Bill which would enable the trustee to know exactly how he stood in regard to this matter, and which would throw a little more light upon the subject.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said if the hon. Gentleman did not want to invest money in colonial stock he need not do so.

SIR JAMES JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street) said he was very glad to hear the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for he confessed he looked with some doubt upon the Treasury in taking up this question. No one recognised more than he did the advantage to the colonists in bringing their funds under the ordinary trusts settlements, but after all he thought, when the Treasury made a move of this kind, it should take such a form as would protect trustees, so that they would have no doubt whether the funds were as safe as our own. He agreed with his hon. friend that the difficulty had been in investing trust funds. In these days, when judges construed the responsibilities of trustees so very closely, the Treasury ought to be most careful in extending the area for trust investments.

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) said he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had taken this opportunity of enabling colonial stock to become trust stock. On several occasions it had been found that the finance of colonies had not been well managed, and he did not see that at the present moment there was any particular necessity to make a change in this direction. The facilities it would give to the colonies to borrow on cheaper terms would be increased, and he did not think the colonists had yet shown themselves to be quite alive to the position they should feel if their stocks were to be regarded as trustee stocks. They were rather too much inclined to borrow money for all kinds of purposes, some of them, he thought, with the idea of catching votes rather than making good use of the money.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

IMITATION OF COUNTY COURT PROCESS BILL [Lords].

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HALDANE asked the Attorney General to give an explanation of the object of the Bill.

MR. CALDWELL also asked for an explanation of the Bill, and particularly as to the method of procedure in the case of an accused person. He did not think it would be reasonable in a matter of this kind to proceed by way of contempt of court. Was he to be tried under the Summary Procedure Act? In that case the procedure would be cheap, and there would be an appeal on questions of law to the higher courts. On conviction he was liable to a fine of not exceeding £10. Supposing a man committed the offence more than once, why should it be a fine? If a man repeated an act of that kind, imprisonment without the option of a fine might be given. He objected to Bills being brought into the House at this period of the session, when they had not time to examine them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) said that he did not make a statement with regard to the object of the Bill in moving the Second Reading, because the measure was short and simple. The Bill was directed against the offence of sending out a summons for payment intending to convey the impression that the summons really proceeded from a county court. That was a serious offence which it was highly desirable to check summarily. Of course it was implied that the document sent emanated from an official of the court. The question of increasing the penalty for a repetition of the offence was a matter for discussion in Committee.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) asked if there were any statistics to show whether the offence prevailed in London or in any particular parts of the country.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I am not in a position to give any statistics on the subject, but I have reason to believe that the offence is not an uncommon one.

MR. MAURICE HEALY said that the object of the Bill was a good one; but it seemed to create a sort of summary criminal jurisdiction in the county court. If the county court process was imitated, that was a criminal offence which should be treated like any other criminal offence. He asked the Attorney General to give some information on that point.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said the nature of the offence was really contempt of court. The process would be by motion. [AN HON. MEMBER: Why not have a jury?] If the hon. Member wished an Amendment of that sort there would be no chance of the Bill becoming law. The offence was one which bore very hardly on the poor. There ought to be some way of checking an abuse which did not affect the more intelligent classes and those who were well to do. It affected only the poor and ignorant, and it was only they who could be taken in by tricks of this kind. It was for their protection that the Bill had been brought in.

MR. T. M. HEALY said this was to be done by motion before the county court judge. That was a novel procedure. So far as he could understand, the Bill applied to Ireland, and he saw no ground why it should not. Perhaps the Attorney General for Ireland would be good enough to inform him how the motion was to be made? Were rules to be made? Who was the aggrieved party to give notice? This Bill came to them from the House of Lords. He was filled with gratitude to that House for sending them a Bill for the protection of the poor man. There was the greatest anxiety for the poor on the Treasury benches. The Workmen's Compensation Act was to provide for the poor, and no lawyer was to come within a hundred miles of the poor. Yet that Act had been nothing but one for lawyers. The poor man was to be protected by this Bill. He respectfully said that a measure of this kind fell beneath contempt. If the Government could not engage themselves on better legislation they should dissolve.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

Clause 1 :—

Amendment proposed—

“In Clause 1, page 1, line 13, to leave out ‘Edward Howley Palmer, Esquire.’”—(Mr. Hanbury.)

MR. T. M. HEALY asked why this respectable gentleman's name was being omitted.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH said that some time ago Mr. Palmer had asked to be relieved of his duties.

Amendment agreed to.

“In page 1, to leave out ‘Lord Iveagh.’”—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Amendment agreed to.

“In page 2, after line 2, to insert ‘The Honourable James Henry Cecil Hozier, M.P.’”—(Mr. Hanbury.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said he desired to know why Mr. Hozier's name was going to be inserted. Was everything going to be made a family matter? He had nothing to say against Scotchmen, but he wanted to know how it came to pass that Mr. Hozier was chosen for this position? Was it a remunerative position or was it not, and was Mr. Hozier a member of the Prime Minister's family or was he not?

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

“In line 2, after the last-mentioned name to insert ‘David Lloyd-George, Esq., M.P.’”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS said he wished to know why the amount had been reduced from seven millions to six millions, and further, whether it was not a fact that of the six millions four and a half millions had been already pledged to various local bodies for the purpose of public works.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston) said that the grant of seven millions last year was a very special one indeed, and was very considerably larger than the average. In 1896 it was only one and a half millions; in 1897, two and a half millions; in 1898, five millions; and therefore he thought that six millions now was a very fair average.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS said that as there was now a Welsh representative on the Board he was sure that they would get justice, and he therefore would not move his Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 :—

MR. T. M. HEALY asked why it was that gentlemen having large property should be allowed to escape these loans. There was a Mr. Lambert, who had been advanced £500 and had only repaid £22. It was the invariable practice of the Government in Ireland, while pressing small tenant farmers for every shilling, to let the landlords off. Here was a man whose name was perfectly familiar to them, who was let off of a sum of over £400, whereas a tenant in Ireland would not be let off 4d. He was first inducted into the mystery of public loans by the First Lord of the Treasury, who, he remembered, in 1881 attacked Mr. Gladstone for his iniquities in connection with them. The right hon. Gentleman then made a great impression on him. He took a stand now on the case of Mr. Lambert, and he wished to know why he was to get off paying over £400.

MR. HANBURY said that, as the hon. Gentleman no doubt knew very well, Mr. Lambert was not getting off at all.

because the debt remained, although it was wiped off the assets of the Local Loans Fund, which had to be done, of course, in the interests of the fund itself. The Treasury did not forego any claim to recover the money so far as it was recoverable. He was bound to say that the advance to Mr. Lambert was rather a foolish advance. There were two advances—one in 1874, and the other in 1881.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Tory Government was in for the first lot.

MR. HANBURY said whatever Government was in did not now matter. The fact was that there was a large head rent, and sufficient regard had not been paid to that when making the advances. The payment of the head rent fell into arrear, and in order to save eviction and loss a salvage creditor paid off the arrears of the head rent and became, therefore, entitled to first priority over the other creditors. Ultimately the land was sold for £800, and nearly £600 went to satisfy the claims of the salvage creditor.

MR. CALDWELL said that the Secretary of the Treasury had stated that the amount of the advances might be eventually recovered, but according to another statement of his the advances were irrecoverable. In this case the money was lent for the purpose of erecting buildings and putting down subsoil. Who was to get the benefit of it? He supposed it would be the head-rent man. It was not fair that money should be spent in this way on property which practically belonged to another man, and out of which the Government would never get a single penny. This case only illustrated the principle on which these loans were given in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that J. Fitzgerald received a loan of £3,000 for the purchase of his holding, which, of course, was said to be the value of the asset. The Government now wiped off £2,800. In other words, the holding on which they advanced £3,000 was not worth anything like that amount. They heard a great deal when the Home Rule proposal was before the country about the iniquity of Mr. Gladstone proposing to lend money for the purchase of Irish land. They were told it would be practically irrecoverable. The right hon.

Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham made a great deal of the plea that the money would be irrecoverable, but here J. Fitzgerald got £3,000, and walked off with £2,800, £200 being the value of the land.

MR. HANBURY said this was one of the unfortunate cases in which a purchase took place from one relation to another. A certain proportion of the money would be recoverable. The value of the land had deteriorated very much from the condition in which it was when sold. He admitted that this was a case where the sum lent was larger than it ought to have been.

MR. T. M. HEALY said they had protested over and over again against the system of fathers transferring land to sons, and mothers transferring land to daughters, and borrowing money from the State under the pretence that this was land purchase. They were entitled to know the name of the Commissioner. It was very regrettable that the money should be wasted, but those who were testifying year after year against this extravagant system in Ireland were not listened to.

MR. HANBURY said the rent of the land was £150. He did not know the name of the Commissioner, but he would ascertain for the hon. and learned Member.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton) said that, the restitution fund having been abolished, they ought to know out of what fund the Government proposed to pay the sums which they intended to wipe off this year.

MR. HANBURY said that what happened was that the loss to the Local Loans Fund was made good by a Vote of Parliament, and if any sums were subsequently recovered they were paid into the Exchequer.

MR. T. M. HEALY said it was understood that a fifth was always retained by the Government in such cases. The advance in this case for was £3,000, of which a fifth would be £600. Therefore only £2,400 should have been lost, whereas £2,800 was actually lost. Why was not a fifth retained? He did not for a moment suggest that the Secretary to the Treasury was in any degree responsible, and doubtless the right hon. Gentleman had not the smallest sympathy with what he was defending. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should supply the date of the loan, the name of the Commissioner making the advance, the name of the valuer, and the Poor-law valuation. If the Land Commissioners knew that such details would be set out in a Public Loans Bill they would be much more careful.

MR. HANBURY said he entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman. He thought more light should be thrown on these transactions, and he would undertake that in future the fullest information should be given. He had already given the name of the valuer, and would endeavour to obtain the name of the Commissioner. As for the fifth which had been retained, it was all exhausted in paying instalments.

DR. TANNER said he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman who J. Fitzgerald was? He happened to know East Cork very well, and there was only one James Fitzgerald there as far as he knew. He was an agent and had grabbed a certain number of farms in the district. He did not want to put it in a painful way, but that James Fitzgerald had a brother, an hon. Baronet sitting in the House for an English constituency. In such matters the process of identification ought to be gone through thoroughly. If he were the gentleman he imagined, he should not have any difficulty in getting a loan, because he was agent to Lord Middleton.

MR. CALDWELL said he thought the Secretary to the Treasury would admit that it was quite proper that attention should be called to the matter, and that it should be gone into in more detail than usual. When money was being advanced on property in Ireland it should be done on business lines. The loan for £2,000, which the Committee was discussing, was only an illustration of how a bogus sale could be got up. The sale in that case was made by a mother to a son, and at that time it was represented that the rent of the property was £150. In 1899, however, only

Mr. T. M. Healy.

£58 could be got for it. In such cases the parties walked off with the money, leaving the Treasury to bear the loss. He thought they might reasonably have a statement showing for several years past the names and addresses of persons whose loans had been written off, and how much had been recovered. It was only right that the persons who were responsible for advancing money in Ireland should be impressed with the fact that the House of Commons would see that proper security was got for the advance, and that if a loss were incurred it would be enquired into. It was only in that way that the matter could be kept on a business principle, and he hoped after what had taken place that the Treasury would see the necessity for issuing special instructions.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment:—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It may be for the convenience of the House if I say that after consultation I have come to the conclusion that the most convenient course for the House would be that the Colonial Vote should be taken on Wednesday.

MR. TOMLINSON: When will the Companies Bill be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Companies Bill will be the first Order To-morrow.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he hoped the Irish Intermediate Education Bill would not be taken after twelve o'clock. If it were to be taken To-morrow it ought to be taken at an early hour.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the Companies Bill was the most important Bill that now remained to be discussed, and he could not hold out any hope that they would be able to take the Intermediate Education Bill at an early hour To-morrow.

Adjourned at a quarter after One of the clock.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Viscount CROSS): Your Lordships, no doubt, are aware that the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act have been very much discussed up and down the country by chambers of agriculture and other bodies, and that a Commission was appointed to inquire into the working of the Agricultural Holdings Act. That Commission reported in, I think, 1898. In consequence of the Report of that Commission this Bill is now brought forward. I may say at once that the great object of the Bill is to simplify procedure and to relieve friction between landlord and tenant as far as that can be done. The foundation of all compensation—the measure of compensation—must eventually be no doubt the value to the incoming tenant of the improvement done by the outgoing tenant. Whatever the value to the incoming tenant may be, that is the measure of the compensation which ought to be given. Probably, my simplest course will be to go very shortly through the different clauses of the Bill—there are very few of them—and explain their provisions, as I hope I shall be able to do at no very great length. The first clause of the Bill re-enacts the old clause of the Act of 1883, but with this distinction. In the first sub-section it re-enacts the old clause of the Act of 1883, but it leaves out a particular proviso—“Provided always that in estimating the value of any improvement in the first schedule he, &c., there shall not be taken into account as part of the improvement made by the tenant what is justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil.”

Those words have been left out, and I should not have wasted the time of your Lordships at the present moment in discussing the matter at any length, because it is more a matter for Committee than for this stage; but I see that a noble Earl on the other side of the House (Lord Grey) has given notice to re-insert those words. I would only, in passing, call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commission on that particular point. They say—

“The Central Chamber of Agriculture recommend that those words should be struck out. Mr. Lipscombe, the chairman of the Committee, who drew the Report, said that they had received a great number of suggestions from affiliated Chambers in different parts of the kingdom, and that a great proportion of these Chambers recommended the abolition of the proviso. Giving his own opinion, he said:—‘I believe, practically, that it has not at all safeguarded the interests of the landowner or of the incoming tenant, but that it has afforded an opportunity of cavilling at the Act unfairly. . . . I believe it has been inoperative, but it is constantly asserted by persons who, perhaps, know more theoretically than practically that it has operated against the outgoing tenant.’”

I should not have referred to that at the present moment if it had not been for the notice of Amendment which has been already given by the noble Earl opposite. That is a matter which will be discussed, of course, when we get into Committee. The second sub-section of the first clause simply refers to the schedules, about which I shall have to say a word or two by-and-by. The third and fourth sub-sections have one very important bearing upon this matter. The first sub-section relates to the compensation payable to the tenant under the principal Act, and says that—

“There shall be taken into account any benefit which the landlord has given or allowed to the tenant in consideration of the tenant executing the improvement.”

The 4th Sub-section relates to the question of manures. But the important alteration of the law which is made by this section is this. The foundation of the whole matter is that a claim must be made by the tenant. If the tenant does not make the claim the landlord is left to his own remedy for any breach of covenant that the tenant may have committed; but under the present law if the tenant makes a claim and the landlord makes a counter-claim for damages as against the tenant he may set off any money that he gets in consequence of his claim, but he cannot go beyond the original claim of the tenant. Therefore it may be that if the tenant claims so much, and the landlord claims a much larger sum for what has been done against the improvement, although the landlord can set it off against the tenant's claim he cannot go beyond the tenant's claim. The Bill that I present to your Lordships alters that, and says that when it comes to arbitration, if the tenant claims and the landlord counter-claims and the counter-claim exceeds the tenant's claim, the landlord may under this Bill get what he ought to have in the counter-claim, and not simply be confined to a reduction of the claim that is made by the tenant. The 5th Sub-section of Clause 1 is to remedy a very curious state of things which exists under Clause 57 of the present Act. Under that clause the tenant was to come under the Act, and if he came under the Act then he was not to have any other remedy than the Act provided. That was supposed so to work that the Act should always be put into force; but under the existing law the tenant had to give notice of the claim, and therefore if the tenant neglected to give notice, or purposely did not give notice, he kept his right to any other remedy besides that under the Act. Therefore that section of the old Act of 1883 became practically of no avail whatever, and in this particular clause we have said that it leaves the tenant his remedy if he chooses to take it, leaving the law as it stands in practice although not in theory. Then we come to the second clause, which is a matter of, I think, very great importance. The second clause relates to arbitration. The great object of this Bill is to simplify the procedure with regard to arbitration. The Arbitration Act of 1889 may be said to be very simple, but that can hardly be applied to this particular Bill without great modifications, and it must be remembered that the Act of 1889 does not apply to Scotland at all, and therefore it is thought better, as those modifications are very difficult to introduce simply as modifications, to re-enact those parts of the Act of 1889 which are applicable, and to modify such parts as are not applicable and to place all the new procedure in the schedule to this Act so that, as this Act has probably to be worked not by lawyers but by laymen, they should have the whole procedure before them. That has seemed to us a very much simpler and better way of drafting the Bill than by reference to modification. Now, of course, the foundation of everything is the tenant's claim. Under the existing law the tenant had to give notice of his claim. That formal notice is by this Bill done away with, and the only limitation that is put on the tenant's right to claim, this—that it must be made before the determination of the tenancy—it cannot be made afterwards. With regard to such a claim when it comes before the court, the provisions of the Bill are certainly, I think, very advantageous both to the landlords and to the tenants. The Bill says—

“(3.) Where any such claim by a tenant for compensation is referred to arbitration, and any sum is claimed to be due to the tenant from the landlord in respect of any breach of contract or otherwise in respect of the holding or to the landlord from the tenant in respect of any waste wrongfully committed or permitted by the tenant, or in respect of breach of contract or otherwise in respect of the holding, the party claiming such sum may, if he thinks fit, by written notice (not later than seven days from the commencement of the arbitration) require the other party to require that the arbitration shall extend to the determination of the claim and thereupon the provisions of this section with respect to arbitration shall apply accordingly, and any sum awarded to be paid by landlord or tenant shall be recoverable in the manner provided by the principal Act for the recovery of compensation.”

So that to prevent any dispute between the landlord and the tenant it may all be settled in one arbitration with a great saving of expense and trouble and annoyance. That, in my opinion, is a very wise provision in the Bill. It is also provided that unless the parties agree to anything else it shall be decided by a single arbitrator. The 3rd Clause relates to the land charges. They are at the present moment made by the county court in those cases where land charges apply. That has been found very inconvenient for many reasons and very expensive. In the first place the county court is not always sitting. It may be some time before you can get the land charges fixed, and therefore it has been decided that the question of the land charges shall be left, not to the county court as at present, but to the Board of Agriculture, who will do the business very much more cheaply and expeditiously than it has been done under the county court. By the 4th Section the provisions of Section 34 of the principal Act are to apply to all

 according to the existing law, if he has acquired or bought it.
 comes a new provision which alters law, and I should say alters the law very popular way. The landlord, by agreement under the present has no power to enter on the hold-order to see that the lease, or what-it may be, is properly carried out, by Clause 5—

the landlord of a holding, or any person named by him, may at all reasonable times enter on the holding or any part of it for the purpose of viewing the state of the ground.

seems to me to be really common and a thing I should think there be no possible objection to. Then is a new provision in the next about penal rents and liquidated damages. This clause puts an end to rents and liquidated damages, in certain peculiar cases. It is—provided that this section shall not apply to a covenant or condition against breaking up permanent pasture, grubbing under-or felling, cutting, lopping, or injuring or regulating the burning of heather."

are matters which so very seriously affect the holding that they are purposely excluded from this particular clause. I have now gone through most of the provisions of this Bill with which it is necessary to trouble your Lordships at present time, with one exception, and the schedules. I said that I would go to the schedules later on, and I do so very shortly. I do not think necessary for me at any length at present moment to go very narrowly into the question of these schedules, but are two points which are certainly of great interest. In the first schedule, which relates to those matters in which you need the consent of a landlord, a new provision is put in. It is not simply the erection or the enlargement of buildings, the erection, alteration, or enlargement of buildings, and the word "alteration" has been inserted perfectly rightly, in my mind, and I think it will be a great help in working out, but no doubt one part of the schedule to which attention will be called by some of your Lordships when we get into detail. As your Lordships are at the present moment the making of osier beds, the making of ponds, or the planting of orchards or fruit bushes, all require the consent of the landlord, but as the Bill now stands, provided that the gardens, or osier beds, or orchards, or fruit bushes do not exceed one acre, then the matter is transferred to the second schedule, in which the consent of the landlord is not wanted, but in which case notice must be given to him, the effect of notice being that when the landlord receives notice, if he chooses, he may do the improvement himself and charge the tenant with a certain rate of interest on the money which is expended.

 But added to the first schedule, in which not only notice must be given to the landlord, but his consent must also be obtained, the old Act included the making of permanent fences, but the words now introduced are "making or removal of permanent fences," which of course is a great protection to the landlord and one that I think ought to be carried into effect. Those, my Lords, are the provisions of this Bill.
 I shall be very happy at a future stage to make any further explanation which your Lordships may desire, but I have thought it best to state the provisions as shortly as I can. I hope your Lordships will give the Bill a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

LORD BURGHCLERE: I hope I may congratulate the noble Viscount on the very lucid manner in which he has explained the provisions of this Bill. It will not be necessary for me, fortunately, to detain your Lordships for more than a very brief time in any remarks which I may venture to make on the measure which the noble Viscount has just introduced.
 A supporter of Her Majesty's Government in another place, and one who I know from considerable experience is a very competent judge of agricultural matters, has stated that this Bill is merely a "small amending measure." It principally concerns itself, as the Lord Privy Seal has pointed out, with the simplification and cheapening of the existing methods by which arbitration between landlord and tenant is brought about.
 Now, my Lords, I am sure that all of us at the present moment are agreed that it is highly desirable and highly advantageous, both for the landlord and the tenant, and for the agricultural interests in the country generally, that the cultivator of a holding should have full and fair compensation for any improvements which he may make during his tenancy, and therefore it is obvious that it is very desirable and very advantageous that any settlement of difficulties by arbitration which may arise between landlord and tenant should be as expeditious and as cheap as is consistent with fair play to both parties in the case. As I have said, and as has been pointed out by the noble Viscount, the sole object—the main object, at any rate—of this Bill is to simplify and cheapen the procedure by which the arbitration is brought about between landlord and tenant, and in so far as this measure properly fulfils that very laudable purpose I am sure there will be no feeling in any part of the House except one of welcome to the measure which has just been introduced. But, my Lords, so complicated and technical is the law relating to landlord and tenant in this country, and so very complex is the legislation which deals with those relations in this country, that it is almost impossible to deal with even the fringe of this subject without arousing susceptibilities and inspiring perhaps fears in some quarter or another. This Bill, in my humble opinion, does not depart from that rule, but as those difficulties mainly refer to matters of detail and not to matters of principle, I think that they are more germane to the Committee stage of the Bill than to its Second Reading. There are, however, one or two points of general interest which I should like to be allowed to refer to very briefly. In the first place, as the noble Viscount has pointed out, for the first time in the history of agricultural holdings that oft-debated phrase, “the inherent capabilities of the soil,” disappears from the Statute-book. I hear from the noble Viscount that there are noble Lords in this House who regret the elimination of that phrase, and who wish to see it re-introduced into the legislation of the country. It may be so. I would venture to refer them to the definition which is given of that particular phrase in a text-book which is very often accepted as a proper explanation of the measure, and I do so with greater confidence because I noticed the other day that in another place a very high legal authority, no less a personage than the present Attorney General, when it was suggested to him that the wording of this particular Bill compared with the legislation of country generally was rather difficult to interpret, pointed out that he himself found great difficulty in understanding the statutes, and that when he did so invariably referred to a text-book on the subject, and he confidently recommended such a course to those who asked questions on the subject. Now, I find a text-book that is very generally accepted in this passage—

“The words, ‘the inherent capabilities of the soil’ may mean anything or they may mean nothing.”

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Will the noble Lord tell us what the text-book is?

LORD BURGHCLERE: It is “Law of Agricultural Holdings,” by Sylvain Mayer; it is a well-known book, in general use. If that be a definition, and if the source to which we were recommended to address ourselves for information by the Attorney General is a competent source, I hardly think that there would be any noble Lord who would wish to retain in the Statute-book a phrase of such comprehensive uncertainty as the one which I refer. My Lords, there is one observation I should like to make about one feature of the Bill which was alluded to by the noble Lord who introduced it. This Bill is in the main a permissive Bill, and the principle of continuing out is maintained in the Bill throughout. Of course I know that there are in many portions of this country highly desirable and advantageous customs which are called the customs of the country by making this Bill a purely permissive Bill those customs are maintained in their entirety, and so far I should think it would have the approbation of the noble Lords who understand the subject. But on the other hand I am bound in justice to the advocates of the Bill as well as to those who oppose it, to point out to the Government that if the principle of arbitration and the alteration of the principle of arbitration which has been made in this Bill are advantageous and for the good of the country generally it is a curious thing that they should be made universal and even compulsory when questions of this nature arise between landlord and tenant. It might be alleged by some critics

Lord Burghclere.

Bill that this would be advantageous possibly to the poorer and smaller tenants as compared with the larger ones, because it is quite obvious that a rich and well-to-do man is much more able to make good terms for himself than one who is poorer and in a different position. However, the Government have not seen their way to make it other than permissive, and therefore the Act will no doubt go on the Statute-book as a permissive Act and a permissive Act alone. The next remark I shall venture to make on the Bill is in regard to the complications, and I am afraid I must call it the bad drafting which has arisen from the abrupt and I would almost say the not very well-considered attempt to combine Scotch and English legislation in the same Bill. As your Lordships are aware, hitherto without exception there have been separate Acts relating to these matters for England and for Scotland. I venture to think that that course has been adopted not without some sufficient reason; because, if you consider it, the methods of cultivation, the relations of landlords and tenants in many parts of the country, and even the very legal expressions by which those relations are defined in the Statute-book, are often completely different in the two countries, and I therefore think it would have been better, on the whole, perhaps, to have conformed to what has been the universal precedent, and to have brought forward a separate measure for Scotland, in order to amend the separate Scotch Acts, rather than what has been done in this instance by, I venture to think, the somewhat hasty attempt to combine the two Acts, laying the seeds, it may be, of some considerable confusion when the working out of the Act takes place. I would venture to illustrate what I mean by one instance. As the noble Lord pointed out just now, in Part III. of the schedule to the Bill, which contains those improvements which may be made without any consent of the landlord whatever, we find a new one—No. 28, “laying down temporary pasture.” Now, I am told—I speak with all submission, and I shall probably be corrected if I am wrong—that in some portions of Scotland, perhaps in Aberdeenshire, temporary pasture is merely one in the ordinary rotation in the crops of that country; whereas, in the South of England, temporary pasture may be well maintained to be an improvement on the holding. Therefore it will come about by this Bill that what is in Scotland merely the ordinary course of good husbandry is in another part of the country made into a tenant's improvement, for which he might claim compensation from the landlord. If that proposition be true, I think I have shown one, at least, of the disadvantages of departing from precedent, and endeavouring to combine the Scotch and English Bills into the same measure. My Lords, that reflection naturally leads me to another criticism which I shall venture to make—namely, with regard to the general drafting of the Bill. I think it will be generally admitted that it is better that every measure should as far as possible be couched in plain and understandable language that may be more or less understood by the ordinary layman, and that is, perhaps, more essential in these highly technical measures which refer to the relations of landlord and tenant, and I think it would be desirable that the Bill should be made as far as possible able to be understood by the agricultural interest itself. The measure should be set forth as far as possible in clear and reasonable terms. Now, I ask whether that is the case in this “small amending Bill,” which has just been brought in? I will venture to read one of the clauses in the Bill, and I shall be glad if any ordinary mortal can put any understanding to it at all. Let me read to your Lordships Clause 10—

“(1) References to the principal Act and to Sections 29, 30, 32, and 34 thereof shall be construed as references to the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, and to Sections 24, 26, 25, and 30 thereof respectively. References to Sections 31 and 39 of the principal Act shall not apply.

“(2) A reference to the Arbitration Act, 1889, shall be construed as a reference to the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894, and a reference to the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895, shall be construed as a reference to the Market Gardeners' Compensation (Scotland) Act, 1897.”

Now, I ask noble Lords generally whether that is a clause which is understandable by the ordinary intellect, and whether it would not require a very considerable knowledge of the statutes of the country, to say nothing of some rather distinguished legal knowledge, to be able to make out what on earth is meant by the clause which is put before us? My Lords, I know I shall be told that this is merely the ordinary sin of legislation by reference, and it has often been pointed out, and I think truly pointed out, that legislation by reference has its advantages in that it is possible in a highly complicated measure to avoid undue discussion on the subject and undue Amendments which may be drafted at a moment's notice without any serious study of the Bill. That may be so, and this method may have its advantages, but I cannot help thinking that, notwithstanding that, this is a course which is doing evil that good may come. But I have a very humble suggestion to make on the subject to Her Majesty's Government. We were told by the Minister for Agriculture in another place that it is intended to consolidate these Acts in another session. The objections which I have pointed out and the advantages which are gained by legislation by reference do not so much apply to a consolidating Bill, because we all know that in a consolidating Bill no new principle is allowed to come in, and therefore there cannot be the same discussion. Now I would suggest to the Government whether it would not be possible, when this consolidating Bill is brought in, not to legislate by reference, but to embody in the principle of the consolidating measure those clauses which would make it understandable by the common intellect. If that were carried out I think it would be doing something which would be of advantage, especially to the agricultural interest. There is only one general observation which occurs to me, and it shall be a very brief one, with regard to the agricultural legislation of the present Government. The remedial legislation of the present Government consists, I think, mainly of two Bills. One is the Agricultural Rating Act, and the other is the measure which we are considering to-day. That, as I understand it, is the sum total of the remedial legislation which Her Majesty's Government have found themselves able to bring in during their lease of power. My Lords, that is a very remarkable fact, well worth the consideration of the agricultural interest. I say this, I assure noble Lords opposite, in no polemical spirit. No one is more confident than I am that the Government are most anxious to bring in, and those who support the Government in both Houses of Parliament would be most anxious to support them in bringing in, any measures which could in any way assist or alleviate agricultural depression or agricultural distress. But it is a remarkable fact, as I have ventured to point out, that after five years of considerable power and a great majority, the most that they are capable of producing—I give noble Lords opposite credit for the intention sincerely to carry out their promises—but the only thing that they have been able to do is to pass the Rating Act and this “small amending measure.” I am sure that no one can be more surprised than are Her Majesty's Government at such a result of their labours, because that was obviously not their intention when they sought and when they accepted office. I very well remember in another place during the three years that the late Government was in power, year after year, session after session, Queen's Speech after Queen's Speech, we were reproached and we were twitted on every side because we neglected the agricultural interest and failed to help it by bringing in remedial legislation. We were told that legislation of this nature was instantly and immediately desired. We were told that during 1892 and 1895. We were told that by very eminent members of the present Government during the General Election of 1895, and even the Commission of Inquiry which we ourselves proposed at that time in order to see whether it was possible to carry out any legislative action in the matter—even that was criticised and condemned, because it was said so instant was the need for remedial legislation that even that Commission was dilatory and unnecessary. I may point out, because I have some interest in that Commission, that notwithstanding that, the Commission has been of the highest possible utility to the present Government, because it is by the Reports of that Commission and by the influence of that Commission that the only two Acts of an agricultural nature which have been brought forward have been suggested and have been adopted by the Government at the present day. But, however, whether that be so or not, and I really do not want to enter into any polemical discussion on the subject—I merely refer to it as a general remark—I say it is most remarkable that after five years, after all the consideration which I have no doubt has been given to it, the only remedial legislation which it has been possible to carry through by the present powerful

Government is a Rating Act about which great differences of opinion exist in many parts of the country, and this measure, which has been termed by one of the Government's own supporters a "small amending Bill." Finally, my Lords, I must add that I am afraid there will be considerable disappointment in some quarters that this long-expected Bill goes no farther than it does. I do not myself hold any very wildly advanced ideas on questions of land tenure, but I cannot help thinking that even the most moderate-minded agriculturist had been led to expect a somewhat larger measure of reform than that which is offered to us in the measure which has been introduced by the noble Viscount to-night. I know many agriculturists who have often told me that they did not expect at any time any possible benefit to them by any possible alteration of the Agricultural Holdings Act at all, but even these gentlemen I think—after a measure has been talked about, promised in Queen's Speech after Queen's Speech, talked about on the platform, written about in the press—even such moderate-minded gentlemen must have had their hopes raised and expectations aroused, and I consequently fear that there may be some disappointment when the measure that has been introduced to-night comes to be thoroughly understood. However, my Lords, although this measure in many ways does not do what many agriculturists I dare say expected it was going to do, yet, as I have pointed out, it does contain some provisions which undoubtedly will be of benefit to the agricultural classes at large, especially in the matter of establishing arbitration between landlord and tenant. That in itself is a very laudable object, and for my part I venture to welcome the measure that the noble Viscount has introduced.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I am sure that so far as the principle upon which this Bill is founded there will be no difference of opinion in the House. I am sure that everyone wishes to be perfectly just in any legislation which concerns the relations between landlord and tenant. On the other hand, my noble friend who has just sat down alluded in rather dark terms to certain possible benefits which certain people are expecting or were expecting to derive from any agricultural legislation.

What those benefits may have been he did not go on to tell us, but according to the line of argument with which he ended his speech, in which there was a reference to the benefits granted by the late Government as compared with those granted by the present Government—

LORD BURGHCLERE: I beg my noble friend's pardon. I made no reference to any benefits conferred by the late Government.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I thought the noble Lord said that there were certain proposals made during the tenure of office of the late Government.

LORD BURGHCLERE: No ; I made no reference of the kind.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Then I beg my noble friend's pardon. At any rate, he threw out certain innuendoes that the present Government had not done what might have been expected from them on behalf of the agricultural classes. Well, my Lords, I do not propose to enter into that part of the argument ; I do not think it is necessary. What we are dealing with to-night is the Second Reading of this Bill, and it is to the principle of the Bill and to the contents of the Bill that I propose to address the few sentences which I have to say to your Lordships. As I said before, with the principle that it is desirable to be perfectly just in any legislation between landlord and tenant, I am sure we are all agreed. When I say the Bill is founded on that principle, it is quite true, as the noble Viscount who introduced it said, that in reality it is a Bill made up of a multiplicity of details rather than a Bill that states a principle which is supposed to have been admitted. Therefore, in considering the Bill, I propose very shortly to follow the example of the noble Viscount, and to go through one or two clauses, more with a view of obtaining information than anything else, which no doubt at a later stage of the Bill will be discussed in considerable detail. On the first clause, which defines the value of an improvement and says it is "such sum as fairly represents the value of the improvement to an incoming tenant," the noble Viscount pointed out to us quite properly that an alteration has been made in this Bill as compared with the existing law, and that that alteration consists in omitting the words which refer to the inherent capabilities of the soil. Those words "the inherent capabilities of the soil," it may be as well to remind your Lordships, were the subject of an Amendment which was very fully discussed in the House of Commons in 1883. The value of that Amendment was not admitted by the proposers only, but it was assented to and agreed to by noble Lords on both sides of the House, including the late Lord Herschell, who said that he considered it was necessary and desirable, and in the end it was inserted in the Act with the full concurrence and consent of all parties concerned. This Bill proposes to omit these words. Now with regard to the exact value of the words themselves I do not propose to say much. The noble Lord quoted to us just now a text-book, which he says is a very good one, in which it is stated that those words have no value at all. It has been stated elsewhere that as a matter of fact valuers never took them into account when making an award under the Act, and that has been given as a reason, and the only reason that I have seen forcibly put forward, why it was desirable and possible without doing any injury to omit those words from this Bill. But one must remember that this section is going to be interpreted not by the writer of any text-book, not even by the judges; it is going to be interpreted, in the absence of agreement, by arbitrators appointed by the Board of Agriculture. What I should like to know is this. I do not myself attach any very great importance to the words. If it were now proposed for the first time to put them in I do not know what I might have said or thought about them; but what I want to know now is, what is the effect of omitting those words in this Act which were expressly put in and were supposed and believed to have some considerable value? Supposing that judges were going to interpret this Act, for instance, which they are not, would they or would they not attach any importance to the distinct omission of a proviso of this kind? That is really the whole point. These words may have value or they may not have, but they are to be decided upon by the arbitrators. Now who are the arbitrators likely to be? They are likely to be men, I should suppose, probably of some practical acquaintance with land for this purpose—men who are not as a rule very skilful judges of legal phraseology. I should certainly like to hear from some legal authority what they would say in a similar case; but is it not likely that an arbitrator would say, "These words which were very much insisted upon and very much objected to by people outside the House have been struck out by Parliament. It cannot be supposed when Parliament was striking the words out that Parliament meant to do nothing at all; it struck them out on purpose, and it is quite clear that Parliament intended to transfer to the tenant something which was refused to him by the law as it stood up to that time." My Lords, I have nothing at this point to say upon that matter further than that I should like to know what, in the opinion of the noble Viscount, and, what is of still greater importance, the opinion of the noble Lord on the Woolsack, is the effect which naturally may be expected to flow from the omission of these words under the conditions which I have named. There are no other matters in the first clause which I think it is necessary to refer to, except that in Sub-section 5 it is said—

"Nothing in this section shall prejudice the right of a tenant to claim any compensation to which he may be entitled under custom, agreement, or otherwise."

My Lords, I rather gathered from the noble Lord who spoke last that he himself thought it might have been advisable to make a Bill of this sort compulsory. Fortunately for the good management and easy management of land in this country, I believe that the bulk of the business will be done, as it has been done, by custom and by private agreement, which is so well understood and which is different in different parts of the country, and not by laws which have been framed by the House of Commons and by this House. Your Lordships know, just as I do, that it is impossible to put into words many of the relations and transactions and duties which are incumbent upon a landlord in dealing with a tenant, and vice versa. There is so much depends on individuals, so much depends on the country, so much depends on the soil, so much depends on the practice, that custom and agreement must always be superior to the law, and I hope that Parliament will never be so unwise—it never has been hitherto, and I hope it never will be—as to attempt to determine the relations between landlord and tenant.

The Earl of Camperdown.

In the second sub-section it is stated that—

“Any claim by a tenant for compensation under the principal Act or this Act in respect of any improvement comprised in the first schedule to this Act shall not be made after the determination of the tenancy.”

As your Lordships know, at the present time the date in Scotland is four months before the expiration of the tenancy. In England I believe it is two months. I may say that I think this change is a good change. As the Bill originally stood it proposed to give a tenant some time after the expiration of the tenancy—an arrangement which would have produced, no doubt, very great confusion; but as the Bill stands it seems to me that you have done what is very fair and right in allowing the tenant to make his claim at any time before he leaves. The proposal in regard to there being a single arbitrator I imagine will obtain general approval. We all wish to do anything which will cheapen the procedure, and although, of course, we shall run the risk of the proceedings being before an arbitrator who is not a skilled lawyer, and who would labour, therefore, under certain disadvantages in interpreting contracts—although we may labour under certain disadvantages, yet on the whole, and taking the probable outcome from the clause, I think the single arbitrator is preferable, and the doing away with the court of appeal is, on the whole, an advisable course for the Government to have taken. My Lords, I do not think I need trouble your Lordships with anything further until we come to Clause 6, but to that clause I should like to call your Lordships' attention. It says—

“Notwithstanding any provision in a contract of tenancy for the payment by the tenant of an increased rent or other liquidated damages for a breach of a covenant or condition, a landlord shall not be entitled to recover, by distress or otherwise, any sum in respect of a breach of any such covenant or condition in excess of the damage actually suffered by him.”

And it goes on with the proviso—

“That this section shall not apply to any covenant or condition against breaking up permanent pasture, grubbing underwoods, or felling, cutting, lopping or injuring trees.”

It seems to me that that proviso proclaims the futility of the clause. Unless there be something contrary to public policy, is it not desirable that a landlord and tenant should be left to make any arrangements between themselves they may choose? Personally I have no love for penal clauses, but I do not see any reason—and surely some reason should be given—why even a landlord or a tenant may not propose and may not make and may not enforce any covenant which they choose. If it could be shown that it was contrary to public policy, and that public or general damage would ensue from that course, then I could understand Parliament forbidding what have been called penal rents; but, on the other hand, you will see in the clause as it stands you limit the damage which the landlord can recover to the damage which he actually sustains. If the clause stood by itself pure and simple every one of your Lordships knows that there are damages which you could not compensate in money. The Government originally proposed to compensate in money for breaking up permanent pasture. It would be perfectly impossible to assess that damage in money. No one can say what it is. It is entirely different in different places. As the noble Lord who spoke just now said, in some parts of Scotland nothing is easier or commoner than to sow down land to seeds and clover, and you get your clover, and the land will stand for several years in grass, and very good grass it is. If you try to do that in some of the strong land in the south of England no pasture comes at all after the first year or so. If the Government had not inserted this proviso and made it apply to permanent pasture, one would have been able to give them an instance in which the clause would have been absolutely injurious and absolutely unfair; and, so far as I can see, when you apply it to permanent pasture or any similar case, nothing can be fairer than that the landlord who wishes not to obtain payment for the damage done, but to prevent any possibility of the damage being done, should be able to say that if a person took a particular course he should be liable to pay a sum which would be sufficient in amount to prevent any likelihood of the act which it is wished to prevent being done. As I say, personally, looking at it as a purely practical matter, one can find no very great objection to it, but in dealing with it as a principle of law surely nothing can be more undesirable than that Parliament should interfere with the right of contract between landlord and tenant, unless there is some positive public reason for so doing. The noble Lord who spoke last made some strictures—and, I thought, very deserved strictures—on the extraordinary phraseology of Clause 10. I do not think I can agree with him altogether in blaming the Government for making the Act applicable both to Scotland and to England. It is desirable to do so if you can do it, and on the whole, having some little knowledge of one part of the country, a part in which there is a good deal of high farming, I have been looking into the clauses, and I may say that I have not been able to see any particular objection to them. I quite admit this—I do not understand them; and I do not think that any other person in this House, or any other Scotchman, possibly could understand them, because they consist simply of references, and I do not think anyone has either the time or the intelligence, and I think probably he is not intended to have either the time or the intelligence, to make himself fully acquainted with their contents; but that is the system which draughtsmen have adopted—some of us think, very deliberately adopted. It has been said before now that this new mode of drafting has been adopted for the purpose of getting Bills through another place, and possibly through this House. I have known recently of cases in which noble Lords have been very much surprised to see things which have happened, and they have been very angry on ascertaining what a particular Bill really meant. Now, my Lords, I come to the schedules. In Part II. of the schedules there are, as the noble Viscount pointed out, some improvements in respect of which notice to the landlord is now to be sufficient where his consent was formerly required. Those matters are the making of gardens, the planting of orchards or fruit bushes, and the making and planting of osier beds. Except in certain rare cases—I believe they are very rare—I do not think it very much matters, because it will not be found very often that the tenants will make gardens or plant orchards or osier beds. They will usually choose to go to their landlords for fruit bushes if they want them, and so far as the making and planting of osier beds is concerned, I dare say they may do that in some places, but those places must be very few. What I want to call attention to is the principle which is involved in this second part of the schedule as amended. The ordinary principle on which a holding is held in England and Scotland has been hitherto, as I understand it, this: that the landlord, executing all or very nearly all the permanent improvements, making the fences, the buildings, and all things of that kind, and having, in fact, the full control of the holding, has hitherto had a right to say for what purpose his holding shall be used, and he has had a right to object if that holding was going to be applied to some purpose other than the purpose for which he let it. Now, what does the clause do? It says that, beyond one acre, no man may make a garden or do any of these other things without the consent of his landlord; but when you get below an acre then anyone may make a garden, plant an orchard, or make an osier bed, and he is to be entitled to be compensated for that. If it is a market garden, he is to come under the provisions of Part III., which refers to market gardens. Well, suppose he has made one garden, and suppose he leaves the holding—the tenant, generally speaking, holds on a yearly tenancy—then the next man comes; is he to be entitled to the same thing over again? How many times may it be done? Is there anything in the Bill to restrict the number of times it may be done? It seems to me that this involves a principle which is very much larger than the mere words or the mere effect which the clause is likely to have. I have no doubt that that will be a matter which will be discussed hereafter. I must apologise to your Lordships for having detained you so long. I do not think it is necessary for me to trouble your Lordships any further.

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, there are two matters upon which I wish to address the House, very shortly indeed, and they have arisen out of the two speeches that we have just heard. The noble Lord on the front Opposition bench made a statement which certainly was not very germane to the Second Reading of the Bill, but it was a statement which I can hardly allow to go uncontradicted. He says that the present Government have only passed two Bills which really have aided the agricultural interest. The noble Lord has forgotten one measure passed by the present Government, and a most useful measure—namely, the reduction of the land tax to a maximum of one shilling. That measure has brought infinite relief to a great many of those who have been struggling with agricultural depression; but apart from that, if there had not been a single measure of any description passed for the relief of agriculture, I maintain that the firm attitude which has been adopted by our Minister for Agriculture in successfully withstanding all insidious appeals that might have led to the introduction of foot-and-mouth disease and swine fever into this country, has done more good than any legislation that could possibly have been introduced. The other matter I wish to say a word or two upon has been touched upon by the noble Earl opposite, and that is the question of the omission of these words, “the inherent capabilities of the soil.” I am well aware that the noble Viscount who introduced this Bill has got, as usual, a Royal Commission at his back, but I do maintain that if Parliament deliberately omits those words that have been in a previous Act people will naturally say, “Well, Parliament did not think it necessary to insert them.” And apart from that, in the ordinary industry of agriculture, I submit to your Lordships that a most important element is the inherent capabilities of the soil. Lastly, I touch upon a matter which has been mentioned by both noble Lords, and that is the extraordinary drafting of this Bill. For years we have been engaged in trying to spread the land amongst the smaller people in this kingdom. We have had allotments, we have had small holdings, we are trying small farms, we are doing what we can to enlarge the number of tenants. Will any noble Lord tell me how it is possible, in three-fourths of a sheet of a Bill of this kind, to explain to any of these small men how he stands in relation to this matter? I know it cannot probably be done in this Bill, but I appeal to the noble Viscount, if he is again, as I hope he will be, in a position to help us in the agricultural world, that he will simplify the procedure.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

LUNACY BOARD (SCOTLAND) (SALARIES, ETC.) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): This Bill is a very simple one. The Lunacy Board for Scotland has been established for about half a century, and at the time it was established a limit was put on the salaries which the Treasury might pay to the officers engaged by the Board. Since that time the scale of payment has risen. The limit of the secretary's salary, which is £420, is certainly inadequate, and the object of this Bill is simply to repeal the maximum salaries, and to leave these civil servants in the position of nearly all other civil servants in the various departments of the Crown, and to give power to the Treasury to fix a proper scale of remuneration. I ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to the Bill.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

INEBRIATES' AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.].

Commons Amendment considered (according to Order), and agreed to.

EXECUTORS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order); an Amendment made; Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 194.)

BEER RETAILERS' AND SPIRIT GROCERS' LICENCES (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

Read 3^a (according to Order), with the Amendments, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

PROHIBITION OF EXPORTATION OF ARMS BILL [H.L.].

House in Committee (according to Order); Bill reported without amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS OFFICES.

Second Report from the Select Committee considered.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY) moved "That the House do agree with the said Report."

*LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, I want to say a very few words upon the last paragraph of this Report, which says that after considering the letter addressed to the Clerk of Parliaments by the Clerk Assistant and certain proposals made by the Lord Chancellor, it was resolved—

"That the Committee, having heard the proposals of the Lord Chancellor, have no recommendation to make to the House."

Now, my Lords, though perhaps it is very discreet of the Committee to have come to this conclusion, I do not think it really represents the mind that was in the minds of members of the Committee. I think I am not misrepresenting the views of large bulk of the Committee if I say the that they were very strongly inclined to the view that the recommendation of the Committee of 1889 was a very reasonable recommendation, and one that it was in the interest of the House to have carried out. The whole question, of course, refers to the appointment of a Reading Clerk to fill the third seat that has been so long vacant at the Table of your Lordships' House. The subject has not been a new one before the House of Lords Offices Committee, and, indeed, if I am not misinformed, it has been much discussed by even a more august body. The facts are these: Prior to the year 1824 the appointment of the Assistant Clerk and of the Reading Clerk was in the hands of the Clerk of Parliaments. It was then transferred to the Lord Chancellor, and since then the Lord Chancellor has had the exercise of the patronage of the two seats at the Table. It has been realised of recent years that the sittings of your Lordships' House are not usually very prolonged, and that therefore the actual work in the House that the Reading Clerk has had to do has not been excessive, and at any rate is not such as to require the full time that a competent man could give to the work. At the same time I think it has been brought very clearly before the House of Lords Offices Committee, both recently during the present session and also on former occasions, that it is desirable that there should be a third clerk at the Table; that great inconvenience might occur through one of the other two clerks being absent, and that though the absolute work of the Reading Clerk is not very great, yet he is able during the sittings of the House to give great help in other respects to the other two clerks, and that really it is in the interests of the House that a third clerk should be sitting at the Table. Now the difficulty is this, that you have got a certain amount of work, not a great deal of work, but yet work that it requires an experienced man to perform, and a man who is acquainted with the procedure and Standing Orders of the House. The Committee has, on more than one occasion, held the opinion that such a man could be found amongst the higher clerks already in the service of your Lordships' House, and that it was a very reasonable and convenient arrangement that one of the higher clerks of the House should have added to his duties the duties of the Reading Clerk at the Table. In the year 1889 the Committee reported, and your Lordships' House adopted the Report—

"The Clerk Assistant and the Reading Clerk were formerly appointed by the Clerk of Parliaments. Since 1824 the Lord Chancellor has appointed these offices. The Committee strongly recommend that the appointment of at least one of these clerkships should revert to the Clerk of Parliaments, and that he should promote one of the senior clerks of his department whom he shall consider most fit for the post. The clerk could combine with his duties at the Table the office of chief clerk or headship of a department. This change would, in the opinion of the Committee, conduce to efficiency no less than economy."

Owing to the unfortunate vacancy that took place in the Reading Clerk's appointment, this question came again this session for consideration before the Committee. I think the Committee's opinion, though not expressed, was, after all, very much in accordance with the resolution of 1889; and in the Committee I ventured to move the reassertion of that resolution. Some conversation ensued, and eventually the noble and learned Earl who sits on the Woolsack suggested that the whole matter might be referred to a Sub-committee of the Committee, consisting of the very eminent Peers, Lord Salisbury, Lord Kimberley, and the Duke of Devonshire. In face of that proposal, on the advice of the Lord Chairman, I withdrew my proposal. These noble Lords met. I understand that the Leader on that Bench and the Leader on this Bench agreed to leave the whole decision of the matter to the Duke of Devonshire, who now sits on the Front Bench. Well, the noble Duke, I am afraid, did not give the Committee any very great assistance by the recommendation that he made, because, so far as I am able to understand it, all the noble Duke decided was that the Lord Chancellor had the most complete right to appoint whom he liked.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): That is not quite an accurate statement of what occurred.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: That was the impression left on the minds of many of us. We received no formal report, and that was the idea left in my mind, at any rate. That, of course, was a power not in the least in dispute, and we most gladly assent to the fact that the power does lie with the Lord Chancellor to appoint whom he chooses. Now, unfortunately, I think rather a personal tone has been given to this question. I am very sorry for it, because I am sure that the very last thought that is the minds of any of us is to cast any reflection whatever on the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and that all we are anxious to do is in the most friendly and considerate way simply to represent to him what our views are. After the Committee sat, the noble and learned Earl then suggested to the Committee that he was quite ready to appoint one of the senior clerks on this occasion to the seat at the Table, which is now vacant, on condition that a Bill should be brought into Parliament for the future transferring the appointment to the Clerk of Parliaments with the further condition that whoever the Clerk of Parliaments should appoint should be a lawyer. Well, that was giving a very new and somewhat unexpected turn to the discussion, because we had not up to that time been informed that the legal service of your Lordships' House had been inefficiently performed under existing arrangements. My Lords, further, I have to point out that when the position of Assistant Clerk was vacant not very long ago, and when the Lord Chancellor made, as we all know, the most excellent appointment in the person of the gentleman who now occupies that position, the noble and learned Lord did not choose a lawyer for that position. Therefore at that time it would seem that there was no great necessity for a further appointment in the legal division; but I must say I think the noble Earl on the Woolsack rather gave his own case away in saying that on this occasion he was prepared to appoint to the seat here the clerk now in the service of your Lordships' House. It seems to me that by offering to do that—and I quite accept and welcome the concession that was made to our views in that offer—yet in making that offer surely the noble and learned Earl did give away his case of the extreme necessity of further legal assistance in respect of the clerks at the Table. As I say, I repudiate any idea of any personal reflection. I am only anxious to see this matter settled in a manner which will be conducive to the efficiency of the service of the House, and also which will prevent any ill-feeling arising between this House and the other House of Parliament. I do hold that we are bound so far as we can to combine economy with efficiency, to endeavour as far as possible to meet the views that have been again and again expressed by the other House, which have also been insisted upon by the Executive, by the Treasury, that as far as possible economy should be exercised with regard to our appointments. I propose to move, as an addition to the motion that this Report be adopted, the following words—

“But this House is of opinion that the appointment of Reading Clerk should revert to the Clerk of Parliaments, and that he should promote one of the senior clerks of his Department whom he shall consider most fit for the purpose.”

That is taking practically the words of the recommendation which your Lordships adopted in 1889, applying it only to the Reading Clerk, and I think it is one which your Lordships would do well to accept. It would not at all fetter the action of the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, who would be perfectly free to appoint whom he liked; but I hope that were such a resolution carried, the noble Earl would be willing to assent to the wish so expressed—a wish expressed, I can assure him, with every desire to recognise his great abilities and the admirable manner in which he has always discharged his duties in this House.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Duke of DEVONSHIRE): I do not know whether the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack will think it necessary to make any explanation or reply to the speech delivered by the noble Lord opposite. I only rise for the purpose of explaining the very small part which I have had in the matter to which the noble Lord has referred. With regard to the motion which the noble Lord has announced his intention of moving, it seems to me it would be a very inconvenient proceeding that such a motion as this should be moved without any notice whatever having been previously given. The House is scarcely in a condition to pronounce a decision on this subject, which has come before the greater part of those Members of the House who are present in an entirely unexpected manner. With regard to the noble Lord's statement, however, my part in this matter has been simply this. I will state it as clearly as I can, although, not knowing that this matter was coming on, I have not the correspondence to which I should have liked to be able to refer. I was not present at the meeting of the Offices Committee when the consideration of the question was delegated, as has been stated by the noble Lord, to the noble Earl opposite and the Prime Minister and myself; but what I understood was that the reference to that sub-committee was to consider what advice should be given to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack in the matter. That was the question which I think at the only time we met was to a certain extent discussed. As has been stated, however, the noble Earl opposite and the Prime Minister agreed to delegate their functions to me, and I proceeded—I admit after some interval—to consider as well as I could how I was to discharge this rather difficult duty, and what advice I should suggest should be given to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. After some conversation with the noble and learned Lord and others, I came to the conclusion that although it was perfectly true that the duties of the Reading Clerk at this Table are not extremely arduous, and could be performed by some other clerk in the Parliamentary offices, who would discharge other duties, yet some inconvenience was considered by the noble and learned Lord to exist through the absence, in what I believe is called the judicial department of those offices, of any official possessing the acquirements of a trained lawyer; and the noble and learned Lord considered that in the discharge of its duties as the highest court of appeal, it would be of great advantage that such assistance should be provided to the House. What I understood the noble and learned Lord proposed to do if he made the appointment was to appoint a qualified barrister, whose time certainly would not be wholly occupied by his duties at this Table, but whose services would be available for the judicial department of the offices. I therefore informed the Prime Minister and the noble Earl opposite that, as there was no question of the right to the appointment belonging to the noble and learned Lord, he might be advised to exercise his right if he was prepared to do so, having regard to the necessity of additional legal assistance on the part of the House. The noble and learned Lord, I believe, saw the letter in which I communicated to the Prime Minister that opinion of mine. He did not act directly upon it in making the appointment, as I suggested he might do, but he made the proposal which has been stated by the noble Lord. As to that proposal of the noble and learned Lord, I have nothing to say. I merely wanted to state exactly the nature of the part which I took in the matter, which was simply to advise that if the noble and learned Lord thought that the judicial business of the House required additional legal assistance he would be perfectly justified in exercising his right to make this appointment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, as I was deputed, in conjunction with the noble Duke opposite and the Prime Minister, to consider this question, I feel bound to say a few words. In the first place, the whole of what the noble Duke has stated appears to me to be perfectly and entirely accurate. It is a matter of fact that when we met Lord Salisbury suggested to me that inasmuch as the noble Duke was the only one of us three who had not taken some part in the matter before, and therefore was not in any way pledged to certain views, it would be convenient, as we had a colleague in the noble Duke who had had nothing to do with the matter before, that we should refer the matter to him to give us his advice. You have heard what was the result. Now I will state my own view. In the first place, I was, with Lord Salisbury, a member of a sub-committee in the year 1889 which considered very carefully indeed the whole question of the officers of the House, especially with reference to the very unpleasant disputes which had been going on with the Treasury, and which had found their echo in the other House, as to the want of economy in these appointments. We recommended to the Committee of Black Rod a variety of changes, all of which, I believe, have been carried into effect, and which, I believe, have in no way impaired the efficiency of the House, and have conduced to very considerable economy. Amongst other changes we suggested that the appointment which is by law vested in the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack should in future, if the Lord Chancellor would consent, be transferred to the Clerk of Parliaments, and that the post of Reading Clerk should be combined with the duties of one of the general establishment. That certainly seemed to me at the time a very reasonable proposal. The Lord Chancellor, who undoubtedly possesses the power by Act of Parliament to make the appointment of Reading Clerk, did pursue that course upon the occasion of the vacancy then occurring; but when another vacancy occurred a difficulty arose, and that is the difficulty we are now considering. Certainly my opinion as to the advantages of the change which was recommended by the Committee which sat in 1889 has never changed, except upon this point, which I wish to explain exactly. When we came to consider the point which was referred to the noble Duke and the noble Marquess and myself, we learnt from the noble Duke that after consulting with the Lord Chancellor he had to tell us that the Lord Chancellor was of the opinion that there was not sufficient assistance to the House in the discharge of its very important duties as a Court of Appeal, and that it would be very desirable that the post of Reading Clerk should be held by a trained lawyer. We had the advantage on the Committee of hearing the opinions of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and if I understood him rightly he based his view upon this—of which, as it seems to me, he is by far the best judge—that with the amount of business which now comes before the House as a Court of Appeal, and looking to the whole conduct of that business, he had satisfied himself that it was desirable for the proper conduct of that very important branch of the business of this House that a trained lawyer should be appointed who should combine with his duties in the House as a Court of Appeal the duty of Reading Clerk. I would just repeat that I entirely agree with the noble Duke that it has been shown that, although there is not sufficient work to be done by the Reading Clerk to occupy the whole of his time, it would be extremely inconvenient to the House that there should not be a third clerk. That, I think, must be very obvious. Our clerks may, like the rest of us, be for a time subject to be absent from illness, and it is obvious that extreme inconvenience might result to the business of the House if there were not a third clerk to take the place of one of the other gentlemen during temporary absence. But, at the same time, it is also perfectly clear that there is not sufficient business attached to the office of the Reading Clerk to occupy the full time of a competent person. Then when the Lord Chancellor, who, of course is, above all men in this House, competent to judge what is necessary for the service of the House as regards the discharge of its duty as a Court of Appeal—when the Lord Chancellor states that he has satisfied himself that it was necessary for the proper discharge of those duties that there should be a trained lawyer appointed, then my advice to the Committee was this: Here is a matter of which the Lord Chancellor is above all the best judge. If he informs this House upon his responsibility and with his knowledge that it is desirable, nay more, that it is necessary, for the discharge of the business of the House as a Court of Appeal, that a trained lawyer should be appointed, and that that trained lawyer in his opinion may also properly discharge the duties of Reading Clerk, it seemed to me that it was beyond my competence to oppose the Lord Chancellor in taking the course which he thought necessary to provide the House with proper assistance. But as I have personally no knowledge of the Court of Appeal, as I am not myself in any way qualified to judge of the assistance the Court of Appeal may require, I considered that it should be left to the Lord Chancellor upon his responsibility to exercise his statutory power to appoint a clerk, who would also discharge the duties of Reading Clerk. Beyond that I was not disposed to go, and I informed the noble Duke that I practically concurred in his view after full consideration, and I also suggested to the Committee that, the state of affairs having been now for a very long time in suspense, it was not desirable that the dispute which had arisen should be pursued further—that although the Committee might some of them have the opinion that the arrangement which was originally proposed was the best one, it was much better for them to leave the Lord Chancellor to take the course which to him seemed to be best, and that therefore we should abstain from expressing any further opinion. That, my Lords, is a complete account of the part I took in this matter, and I have nothing to add except this, that never in the whole course of the business have I had the smallest wish or desire or reason to attribute any evil motives to the Lord Chancellor, or to find fault with any view he may hold if he holds it on his own judgment and responsibility.

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I was not aware that there was to be a discussion upon this matter to-night, but as I was Chairman of the Committee I can hardly allow the debate to pass without saying a very few words on the subject. I very much agree with what the noble Lord (Lord Kimberley) said in his last remarks. I certainly have not the means of judging what is required for the discharge of the duties connected with this House as a Court of Appeal, and I quite agree with the noble Earl that there is nobody in this House so capable of judging of those requirements as the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. But I do want to lay very great stress upon this, that if an extra officer is required for the Court of Appeal he should be appointed by the Lord Chancellor himself on his own responsibility, and that there should be no transfer to the Clerk of Parliaments or anyone else any patronage connected with that appointment. That I feel very strongly indeed. I always understood that the Clerk of Parliaments, who is a trained lawyer, was a Registrar of the High Court, and that the clerical duties connected with the judicial business were performed by Clerks of the House, who had done their work with ability and with great industry. The late Mr. de Burgh was a very able head of the Judicial department, and I was under the impression that the present department have done their work well, but on that I desire, of course, to defer to the judgment of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. But this I do say: that our proposal of 1889 was that a clerk at the head of the establishment of clerks should take the duties of Reading Clerk upon him in addition to his ordinary duties. I wish it to be distinctly understood that we never proposed to add to the patronage of the Clerk of Parliaments. We merely gave him an opportunity of recommending to the Lord Chancellor a clerk who should, in addition to his existing duties, perform the duties at the Table, which, as everyone must admit, are not sufficiently onerous to occupy the whole time of a gentleman of ability. Under those circumstances we consider that as the appointment was limited to the establishment of which the Clerk of Parliaments is the head, it would be reasonable and obviously desirable, he knowing the gentlemen who are comprised in that establishment, that he should have that patronage—well, I will not say patronage, but should nominate the gentleman who should perform those duties. But if it comes to appointing for an absolutely different purpose an extra officer—for such he will be—to perform important duties in the Court of Appeal, then I think the Lord Chancellor himself should have, as he has at present, the statutory power of appointing that officer. That is all I wish to say on the subject. Placing aside the opinion which the Lord Chancellor has given as to the needs of the Court of Appeal, I have always considered that the recommendation of the Sub-committee of 1889—which was composed of the noble Earl opposite, Lord Kimberley, and the noble Marquess the Prime Minister, and other distinguished Peers—was a very reasonable one, and I would remind the House that it has been communicated with our Reports to the House of Commons and to the Treasury. I am not inclined to change my mind as regards that recommendation, but the point I do lay great stress upon is this: I think it is of very great importance that we should have a third Reading Clerk at the Table. The work, though it is not onerous, requires extreme care. Sometimes we have sixty or seventy notices on the Paper, and the keeping of the Minute requires a very great deal of care, and any little disturbance to the clerk who is keeping the Minute renders the duty very difficult.

I do most sincerely hope that however the matter is decided we shall be left no longer in suspense, and that the matter will be decided once for all.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: My Lords, I cannot help feeling that this matter has been sprung upon me by surprise. The documents that I should have wished to refer to are not here, but I think I can sufficiently trust my memory to say what I have to say on the subject. In the first place, I am glad to learn that no personal object of mine is suggested in the course I pursued. The view which I take and which I must say I very strongly take is this: that the highest court in the kingdom ought not to be without one of those auxiliary persons or some of those auxiliary persons who are known in the courts of law as chief clerks or masters, or what not. The House of Lords as a Court of Appeal is the only court that has not one. I am not forgetting that at this moment the Clerk of Parliaments happens to be a lawyer. He need not be, and sometimes the Clerk of Parliaments has not been a lawyer; but as a matter of fact the present Clerk of Parliaments is a lawyer. But, my Lords, it is not the Clerk of Parliaments that is to be considered, it is the judicial staff which is required for the House as a Court of Appeal; and certainly I am very deliberately of opinion that it is something approaching a scandal that the highest Court of Appeal should not have those officials which every other court, down even to the county court, possesses; and I have been desirous, notwithstanding the Report which was made so long ago as 1889, that that scandal, as I do not hesitate to term it, should be removed. After the conciliatory tone of the speech of the noble Lord who introduced the subject I do not wish to say anything that would conflict with the harmonious spirit in which the matter has been discussed; but for the purpose of informing your Lordships I am obliged to say that the Committee, as it originally sat, thought it right to proceed without the slightest notice to me, and my first notice that such a resolution had been passed, although I was Chancellor at the time, was the fact that I received a notice of the passing of the resolution. I am quite sure it was from no intentional disrespect, but I doubt very much whether any of your Lordships would desire to alter the patronage of an office that belonged to a person without thinking it necessary to ask him to attend, so that you might form some judgment after hearing him. I venture to think that the fact of this House being a great court of law was not present to the minds of the Committee. Your Lordships who meet here at half-past four for public business are not aware—at least, it does not occur to you—that some of us have been here since a quarter or half-past ten o'clock in the morning, and it is forgotten that besides its functions as a great legislative body this House is the most important court of law in the kingdom. Certainly, having regard to the business now being done here, and to possible changes that there may be hereafter, I myself am very reluctant that the opportunity should be lost of strengthening the legal part of the House by the appointment of a lawyer to the vacant clerkship. I believe it will be a misfortune if advantage is not taken of that opportunity. Suppose one of these days a question arises as to the staff of the House of Lords as a court of law compared with the staff of other courts of law. Just imagine what would be said when it was shown that the Court of Queen's Bench or the Court of Appeal had trained lawyers as masters or chief clerks, while the highest court of all did not have that assistance. I very much object, however, to be called upon to exercise the power given to me by statute if at the same time I am to be limited in the choice that I am to make, and I thought, and I think still, that the proper course would be to repeal the statute, and, so far as I am concerned, I should not offer the smallest objection to this patronage being taken from the Lord Chancellor and transferred to the Clerk of Parliaments. But I did object, and I do object to be called upon to exercise the power which the statute gives me and yet be told that my choice is limited. Certainly if anyone were to propose to repeal that statute in the way I have suggested he will not find me opposed to it; but at the same time I have given my deliberate judgment, and I think the opportunity ought to be taken to appoint a lawyer. After what has passed, if your Lordships should confirm the view that I have expressed, I will take uncommonly good care that no one shall suggest that I have any interest in the matter of this appointment. It has occurred to me that it would be a very good course to ask the Lord Chief Justice of England to select some person whom I should appoint. I have nothing further to say to your Lordships except this, that I think that those who advised originally in this matter must feel that they made a mistake in not consulting me before that resolution was come to.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I cannot help reminding the noble and learned Lord that he was a member of the Committee who passed this Report after a great deal of deliberation.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: The noble Earl is speaking of a subsequent period, because at the time that Report was agreed to I had never heard of there being such a Committee at all. Although I was Chancellor for a short time in 1885 and came in again in 1886, the Committee was never called to my attention. I certainly think that they ought to have asked me to attend, and have called my attention to what was being done. That, as it appears to me, was the error that they committed. However, I have nothing further to say upon the matter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I was a member of that Committee, and I am quite free to say that I think it would have been much better if a communication had been made to the Lord Chancellor. But at the same time I must say that I am considerably astonished to hear that the noble and learned Lord, who had then presided over the House for two or three years, was not aware that there was a Black Rod Committee, and was not aware that he was a member of that Committee. I believe notices of the meetings are always sent to every member. No doubt it would have been better if special notice had in this case been sent to the Lord Chancellor, but I suppose that did not occur to any member of the Committee, and unfortunately it was not done. However, my Lords, that is a matter which occurred a very long time ago, and I think it is scarcely necessary or desirable to bring up again anything which occurred then.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: After the conversation that has taken place I certainly shall not think of troubling your

Lordships with the motion. I can only say that, so far as the former Committee was concerned, no blame can very well rest upon my shoulders, because I was not a member of your Lordships' House at that time.

On Question, Report agreed to.

EDUCATIONAL GRANTS—DIFFERENTIAL TREATMENT IN RURAL AND URBAN SCHOOLS.

LORD HENEAGE, in rising to call attention to the Return issued in accordance with an Order of the House of Lords on 5th July, 1900, showing the results of the differential treatment in urban and rural schools, and to move—

"That the experiment of the last four years has been most injurious not only to the agricultural counties as a whole, but to the large majority of the Church of England voluntary schools associations, and should be discontinued," said: My Lords, I shall limit my very few remarks to the question of the differential treatment of schools in rural and urban districts. Some two months ago I asked my noble friend the Lord President of the Council if he would let me have a Return, which your Lordships have since had placed in your hands. My noble friend then made the very sensible suggestion that I should move for the Return as unopposed, and that any discussion should be taken after the Return had been laid. The Return has now been laid upon the Table, and we are now in a position to discuss the matter. In Lincolnshire we have lost a great deal of money, taking the rate at 5s. a head under the Act, under the differential treatment, and on two occasions the governing body of the Voluntary Schools Association of Lincolnshire has sent a memorial to the Education Department, which I hold in my hand, but with which I will not trouble your Lordships. Under the Voluntary Schools Act of 1897 the aid grant was to be not more than 5s. a head, but no precise directions were laid down as to any differential treatment between schools in urban and rural districts. The principle or the experiment, whichever you like to call it, which has now been in practice ever since the Act was passed, I venture to say has not been satisfactory either to the rural schools or to the Church of England. In the few remarks I am going to make I propose to limit myself absolutely to facts and figures, and I am not going to make the slightest comment upon the Education Department. I think so far as the Departments are concerned they have given the associations every assistance they possibly could. They have shown considerable ability and the greatest courtesy to us when we have had reason to write to them for advice in conducting what has been a new and rather difficult experiment in legislation. I was told after the first year that the experiment had been a failure, and that it was likely not to be continued. Unfortunately it has now gone on for a period of four years. I am only dealing now with the three years that are put forward in the Return, during which time the rate has been paid at 5s. 9d. per child for every child in the urban districts, and 3s. 3d. per child for every child in the rural districts. I am myself unable to see, and the members of the governing bodies to which I belong are utterly unable to see, why there should be this difference of treatment between the rural and urban districts. So far as we can judge, for what it is worth—and I have been on the executive body or central committee of the Lincolnshire Voluntary Schools Association for four years—it is the rural districts and not the urban districts which require the most favourable treatment. Again, it must be remembered that, although this aid grant is allocated at a differential rate towards urban and rural schools, the money is all pooled together when it arrives in the hands of the association, and the governing body can deal with it exactly as they like. As a matter of fact they do not care whether a school is in an urban or in a rural district. They only look to the necessities of the school, and they treat it as it ought to be treated, with equity and justice. But what is very material with regard to this differential treatment is that in associations where the children in rural schools are a larger number than in urban schools they are very great losers by this differential grant. The large towns and the large urban districts gain largely. The agricultural districts—your Lordships have only to look at the Return yourselves to see this—lose enormously, but they require the aid very much more, in my opinion, than the urban districts. In the large towns in most cases there are school boards, and therefore, looking at it entirely from an educational point of view, the children would receive education whether there were voluntary schools or not, but in the rural districts they would be without education altogether in a large proportion of the parishes if it were not for voluntary schools. You could not have boards at all—you could not get the men fitted to sit on the board; you could not get the rate to pay for the schools; these schools are very small schools. In Lincolnshire—I am speaking now from what I know—they do not average more than an attendance of thirty or forty children, and anyone who takes any interest in the education given in these very small schools knows that they get a very small education grant because there are so very few children to earn the grant. They are, therefore, in a very great difficulty in that respect, while if a competent staff is to be kept up to teach the children in their parishes as you would have them taught, it is kept up at greater relative expense. Therefore these small schools require special assistance, and I do not see why the grant to them should be less than the grant to the urban districts. I will give your Lordships only one example—I could give you a great number—of how absurd and ridiculous this distinction becomes. I am not going to say that there are not good reasons for it—no doubt the noble Duke will give your Lordships what he considers good reasons; but let me deal with three parishes close together in the north of Lincolnshire. Roxby, with a population of 378, has one school with an average attendance of 43 children. But that is an urban district, so that the allocation of the aid grant is at the rate of 5s. 9d. per child. The school is solvent and non-necessitous, and receives no aid grant. Close by are the two combined parishes—really one parish—Barrow-on-Humber and New Holland. They have two schools. Their population is 3,200. In the one school the average attendance is 222, and the school is non-necessitous; in the other the average attendance is 241, and the school is specially necessitous. Both these schools are in rural districts, and the money is paid on account of them to the governing association only at the rate of 3s. 3d. per child. Yet they want all the assistance that it is possible to give them. Now, I will not detain your Lordships at any length, but I should like to quote one or two figures to prove my case. I will ask your Lordships to allow me to deal with the results of the differential system of allocation of the Aid Grant on the agricultural county of Lincoln so far as the Church of England schools are concerned. In 1897 we had 44,253 children in average attendance. Of these 20,400 were in urban district schools, and were paid for at 5s. 9d. a head, and we received on their account £5,867 17s. 6d. The other children, 23,843, were at rural schools, and we received at the rate of 3s. 3d. a head for them, making £3,874 9s. 9d. So that, although there were 3,000 more children in the rural schools than in the urban schools, we received £2,000 less on account of payment of Aid Grant to deal with them. Similar results (I will not trouble your Lordships with the details) were arrived at in 1898 and 1899. In each of those three years we received, putting all the money together, at the rate of 4s. 5d. per head of the children. The total received in 1897 was £9,742 7s. 3d., instead of what we should have received at 5s. per head, £11,063 5s. In 1898 it was £9,731 2s., instead of £11,021 10s. In 1899 it was £9,692 3s., instead of £10,983 10s., or an actual loss of £3,759 19s. 5d. in three years, notwithstanding that we received 5s. 9d. for the children in the urban districts. Now, I have quoted the actual sums that were received on the allocation of the grant. Take those figures, in order to compare them with the figures in the Return, and you must add the second allotment, which is received some months afterwards, and in Lincolnshire amounts to one penny per child. I only say that because that shows the difference between the figures. Now, the general effect of this on the whole of the schools is that in forty-six Church of England Association schools only eight received at the rate of 5s. per head, whilst of those eight, five—London, Liverpool, Manchester, Wakefield, and Rochester—received at the rate of 5s. 6d. and upwards. The remaining thirty-eight Church of England Association schools lose on an average 10 per cent. of the present differential rate allocated. As a consequence of this principle (I do not for a moment say that it is intentional) the Roman Catholic, the British and the Wesleyan schools gain very largely, because they are schools in the urban and not in rural districts. I may quote to your Lordships a paper which has been prepared upon this point which appears to me to be very accurate and worthy of notice. It is stated in the Schoolmaster of the 14th July that—

“In 1897 the Church Federations of London, Liverpool, and Manchester score no smaller amount than £15,295 above the 5s. limit, the chief losers being Gloucestershire, Lincolnshire, Oxfordshire, Hertfordshire, Norfolk, Wilts, Berkshire, Kent, Cumberland, Sussex, Dorset, Durham, and Essex.”

Therefore, it is practically at the cost of these other counties that these privileged federations receive their contributions. Thirty-eight Church Federations lose £27,684; that is, taking it at 5s. a head. Eight Church Federations gain £17,402, so that there is a net loss to the Church schools of over £10,000. That is the case I wish to bring forward. The memorial presented by the governing body last year, and which was again sent this year is as follows—

“The governing body of the Lincoln Diocesan Association of Voluntary Schools desire to represent to the Education Department that, in consequence of the different rates fixed for town and country schools, between which the distinction is in many cases artificial and anomalous, the total Aid Grant allotted to their Association fell short by no less a sum than £1,320 17s. 9d. of the amount which would have been received if 5s. per head had been given to town and country schools alike. The Association, having to deal with a large number of small country schools, in which the average cost per head of efficient maintenance must be greater than in any other class of schools, has therefore been unable to recommend grants adequate to help and increase the efficiency of many of the necessitous schools in its area; and it cannot with the present rates of allotment make satisfactory provision for improved training of pupil teachers, and for such objects as manual instruction in cookery.”

That is the case I have to present on behalf of the Lincolnshire governing body, and I am very sorry that it should have to come on at such a late period of the session and in so small a House. I am also exceedingly sorry that I had to put this matter off from Friday last until this evening, because Lord Reay, who takes a very great interest in this matter, is unable to be here.

THE LORD BISHOP OF MANCHESTER: My Lords, as the Diocesan Associations of Liverpool and Manchester have been referred to as having been specially benefited by the distinction made between urban and rural schools, I think I should say a few words in favour of the discrimination. There are, I have no doubt, anomalies in special cases which it would be difficult to explain; but on the large scale I venture to think that there are very good reasons to be given for the present system. For instance, if you notice the number of children in the urban districts, that are spoken of rather depreciatingly by the noble Lord—

LORD HENEAGE: I did not intend to depreciate them at all.

THE LORD BISHOP OF MANCHESTER: I simply meant speaking of them depreciatingly in respect of the fact that they are a very small minority of the schools. I am trying to point out that, though they may seem to be a minority of the associations, they contain an enormous number of children in average attendance, and the London schools have as many as 120,000 children in average attendance, so that the number of children affected by any change in the present system will be considerable. Now I agree that if there be nothing different in the circumstances of the urban and village schools to justify discrimination there ought to be none; but I venture to think, at any rate, that these two reasons may be given for making the discrimination in Lancashire: first, the enormous number of school boards that exist there, the necessity of providing for rates in aid of these Board schools and also at the same time providing voluntary contributions, and the very much larger salaries that we are obliged to pay to our schoolmasters and our staff because of the competition of the Board schools making our expenses very much more than they would be. But the principal reason is this. There was an Act passed which if I am not misinformed (the Lord President will no doubt tell us) was intended mainly to benefit agricultural schools, an Act which enabled the parent of any child to demand that that child should be educated free of cost. Now that, I have no doubt, benefited greatly the agricultural districts. The fees paid there were very small, and the remission of the fee was therefore quite easy, but in the north the fees paid were very considerable—from 3d. to 6d. a week per child, and those fees were easily paid because we had a large industrial population receiving high wages. It was never felt to be a burden. We had no difficulty in obtaining the money, but the moment the opportunity was afforded to those who were the poorer amongst the parents to demand free education, of course they demanded it. Further, I would venture to say to your Lordships, because I know it to be a fact, that a number of those who are unfriendly to Voluntary schools stimulated parents to make these demands with a view to making it more difficult to conduct voluntary schools, and then a feeling of chivalry on the part of those better paid of the working classes made them feel "Rather than leave the poorer of our brethren in an invidious position we will make the demand for free education." The result is that we have lost a very large proportion of the funds upon which we relied for the maintenance of elementary schools. That deficiency must be supplied in some way. I venture to say that the deficiency is small in agricultural districts because the fees charged were small and the remission was easy. The fees charged in manufacturing districts were considerable, and therefore their remission was a blow to the prosperity of the schools. Therefore, as they have these particular disabilities, I venture to submit to your Lordships it is fair that they should have a certain number of compensating advantages.

*THE BISHOP OF HEREFORD: My Lords, as representing a diocese quite at the opposite pole to that of my brother of Manchester, I should like to say a few words on this subject. I do not propose to follow him through the arguments that he has put before us, and I am not sure that I should agree absolutely and entirely with him, but my desire is rather to address myself to this question as representing one of the most rural of all the dioceses, and a diocese which has, if I may venture to say so, been more hardly hit by this method of distribution than any other diocese in the kingdom with possibly one or two exceptions. I was surprised that in the list of dioceses that had suffered the diocese of Hereford was not mentioned. The facts as put before us in this Return are that if the distribution had been at the rate of 5s. per child, we should have received for the Hereford diocese something like £5,914. As a matter of fact, we only received £4,795 a year, thus losing a sum of £1,119, or suffering, that is to say, to the extent of nearly 20 per cent. If we look at the rate per child which is received by my two associations, the Association of Hereford and the Association of Ludlow, it only averages 4s. 1d. per child. I venture to ask your Lordships to notice that this is one of the very lowest of all the averages throughout the kingdom. Now, my Lords, I wish to join with the noble Lord who has put this question to this extent, and to say that in the diocese of Hereford there is no doubt a good deal of feeling that we do not receive more than 4s. 1d. per child; but for myself I could not go further than saying that I shall be extremely grateful to the noble Duke if he sees his way by any means to give us a larger share of this Special Aid Grant, and in appealing to him I would venture to urge two reasons—both of them I feel to be strong reasons—why he should consider the possibility of giving us a little more money for our rural schools. One is that our schools throughout my diocese are many of them so very poor that we are obliged to employ a very large number of teachers, assistant teachers in particular, with qualifications which I am sure would not satisfy your Lordships. In my diocese, even in the city of Hereford, there are a very large number of teachers who are known in the language of the Education Department as Article 68. Now, my Lords, what is an Article 68? It is simply a respectable young woman who is eighteen years of age, and she has to present no other qualification whatever for employment as a teacher. Now, some of these young women are excellent teachers, but I cannot help thinking that it is unsatisfactory that, as part of our National school system, we should be obliged to employ so many assistant teachers who are not duly qualified. Many of them, I am bound to confess, are, in intellectual qualifications, hardly fitted to be teachers of the children of our rural population. Therefore, on this ground of want of more means—for these teachers are very poorly paid; indeed, the reason they are employed is that they can be got so cheap—I venture to appeal to the noble Duke to consider as favourably as possible this application. If he does entertain it he may rest assured that any additional money given for this purpose will be well administered. I have in my hands the report of my association, and I cannot but feel that it will be satisfactory for your Lordships to know how the Special Aid Grant which we have received has been spent. I find on looking at the matter that no less than 62 per cent. of the money that we receive has been spent on the improvement of the salaries of the teachers—to my mind the very best and most economical way of spending such money. Then I find that 30 per cent. of this money has been spent on the improvement of furniture, books, apparatus, buildings, playgrounds, and the sanitary arrangement of the schools. So that on the whole sum that we have received under the Special Aid Grant something like 92 per cent. has been expended on these most excellent improvements. That I cannot but hope the noble Duke will consider gives us some claim for any additional help which he feels able to bestow upon us. But, my Lords, having said so much, I am bound to say that, looking to the facts of the case, I should not envy the noble Duke if he were to take away from the urban districts—from my brother of Manchester and others—the money which has been allocated to them. It is a task which I hope he may be able to accomplish, but from which I should shrink. I am bound also to confess, having some knowledge of town schools as well as rural schools, that many of our urban schools are no less necessitous than those in the country. For myself, if I may be permitted to add a word or two, I must acknowledge that I look to other sources of help rather than to an additional share of the Special Aid Grant. In this connection I think it right that, as representing the schools in my district, I should express my gratitude to the noble Duke for having given us the prospect of additional help through the proposed block grant. It must not be forgotten that the working of that proposed method of the block grant, so far as I have been able to investigate, and as I understand it, is likely to bring very substantial additional assistance to our country schools. I have taken occasion to look into two or three of our typical schools and see what will be the probable effect of the new block grant, and I find that, taking one of our weak schools—and I am sorry to say that we have a great many of them, just as they have in Lincolnshire—I find it is a reasonable expectation that a school which has been receiving a grant of between £29 and £30 per annum will receive £33, so that that school will receive an advantage of something like 12 per cent. But turning to another school, of which we have a much larger proportion, that is the fair average country school—somewhat small—I find that such a school which has received £59 or £60 in the way of grants will probably receive over £70. For that addition we are very grateful. There is another class of school—there are not so many of them as we should all like to see—and that is the really good school. Now, the really good school in my district will hardly profit at all by the block grant system. A school which is receiving, perhaps, £240 or £245 per annum will be likely to lose about £5 per annum, and that, if I may venture to say so, is one of the defects of the proposed change to the block grant, that it does not give so much assistance and encouragement as I think they deserve to the best class of schools. One cannot help thinking that in every educational reform it is desirable to encourage the highest and best schools, and this change, unless it can be in some way amended, will, I fear, rather tend to lower the standard of education in some respects than to raise it. I find that the block grant has been received by the teaching profession with acclamation, and I am not surprised, because teachers are human like other people. The best teachers welcome it because it will give them more liberty to teach in the best way, and the other teachers welcome it because it gives them more freedom from minute regulation. I am afraid that under that system some slackness may come in, and individual children may be neglected, and the education may not advance in consequence as the noble Duke would desire. Therefore I hope some special care may be taken as to the instructions issued to the inspectors in order that this system may not do some harm as against the direct financial good that it will do. But, my Lords, there is still another point that I desire to urge upon the noble Duke in connection with this matter, and that is that he may give us in our best country schools very material assistance if he will make the new higher education minute apply to our good country schools.

If it is simply to apply to a separate school, such as a higher grade school in a town where it is not always very welcome, then it will be almost entirely inoperative in a diocese like mine and will do practically no good, but if it could be extended so that in any good, efficient elementary country school the managers might be at liberty to add a higher elementary top, that would be a great boon to us in the country and a great assistance to our rural education. My Lords, there is just one other remark I may venture to make, and that is that while we are grateful for the additional assistance given us under the block grant, while we shall be grateful if we can have more of the Special Aid Grant, I have the profound conviction that we shall never be able to put our rural schools on a satisfactory basis, or to give the children of our rural population the sort of education that we ought to give them until Her Majesty's Government can devise some means of putting our parish schools under public management. I cannot but hope that this may be done, that the noble Duke may before long see his way to do it by introducing some Bill which will enable the managers of Voluntary schools to approach, let us say, the parish council, with a view to a parish education committee, all religious education to be reasonably safeguarded. On that parish education committee, of course, the parish council should have the majority of managers, the other managers being representatives of the trustees of the school and the parents of the children. In that case the parish would have power to levy a rate, and so to give that adequate financial support to our rural schools of which they are in such sore need in many districts.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: My Lords, I think it is scarcely necessary or desirable that I should attempt to follow the right rev. Prelate into a discussion of the effect of the provisions as to the block grant in the new Code, or as to the future development of higher elementary schools. The suggestions which the right rev. Prelate made are no doubt important and well deserve full consideration, but I do not think probably it would be convenient to your Lordships that I should follow him into that part of the subject at present. My Lords, I am somewhat at a loss to understand what object my noble friend who has brought forward this resolution had in moving for a Return, and in giving us the calculations which he has founded upon it. I could have told my noble friend without any Return and without any calculations that when the Special Aid Grant is divided between urban and rural schools in the respective proportions of 5s. 9d. and 3s. 3d. the districts which contain a large number of urban schools would gain a great deal more than districts which contain a large number of rural schools. My noble friend's contention is that which I believe he has always consistently maintained. He objects to the discrimination. But it was not necessary to produce a very elaborate array of figures in order to show that the discrimination which was provided for in the Act, and which has been put into effect by the Board of Education would have the effect which it has had. That effect could have been calculated with considerable accuracy beforehand. The noble Lord said that the experiment had failed. If by failure he means that in consequence of the discrimination various districts have received various amounts, failure was inevitable; but I do not know in what way failure is proved, because, in our opinion, the discrimination has had mainly the effect which it was intended to have, and has given the greater share of the grant to what we believe to be the most necessitous cases. The reasons which induced Parliament and the Department to make this discrimination were shortly these: In the first place the rural districts generally had gained and urban districts had lost through the operation of the Fee Grant, inasmuch as in urban districts fees for 1891 were in excess of 10s., and in rural districts they were considerably under 10s. In the next place the local interest of the well-to-do classes in the maintenance of Voluntary schools is generally greater in the rural than in the urban districts; the power to raise voluntary contributions being greater, the need for further assistance is less. In the next place special provision is made for the most necessitous schools in rural districts under Articles 104 and 105 of the Code. I may say a word upon that subject by-and-by. In the next place the cost of living and therefore the amount paid for salaries is higher in the urban than in the rural districts. It may also be added that in rural districts the proportion of schools which possess liberal endowments, and are therefore not necessitous, is greater than in urban districts. Presumably in urban districts new endowments have not kept pace with the growth of population. The experience of the past three years has on the whole justified the conclusions which we drew from these facts. The rates of Aid Grant for town and country schools were fixed so as to secure as nearly as possible that the actual allotment of aid grant to the several associations should range from 4s. to 5s. 6d. per head. Now, my Lords, I refer to Articles 104 and 105 of the Code, which are articles which provide for schools in districts of very small population. The small schools in the Norwich Association (which is one of those which apparently receive a very low rate from the Special Aid Grant) received £3,930 under these articles, or 1s. 5d. per head on the attendance of all schools in the association. In the Sudbury Association they received £1,285, or nearly 2s. per head. In the Lincolnshire Association (the case of which my noble friend has brought forward) they received £4,105, or 1s. 10½d. per head. In contrast with these figures, the schools of the London Diocesan Association received £35, or an infinitesimal fraction of a penny per head, and those of the Manchester Association received £395, or a trifle over a halfpenny per head. I think I have only to add that the Right Rev. Prelate who has just spoken was also perfectly right in saying that the new provision for a Block Grant would be a considerable assistance to schools in the rural districts. Therefore, whatever case my noble friend may have had previously to the introduction of that change, his case is somewhat weaker than it was. My Lords, I quite admit that a larger amount of assistance would be very acceptable, and probably would be admirably expended, if it were in our power to give it to rural schools, which in many districts are no doubt extremely necessitous, but, as the right rev. Prelate said just now, we could only do this at the expense of other schools which we believe to be still more necessitous, and therefore, for the present at all events, and until we see reason from further experience, I cannot hold out any hope that we shall be likely to alter the rates which the present Code has fixed.

The Duke of Devonshire.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—BRITISH REPRESENTATION —CONSUL GENERAL WAREN.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe):
I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the fact that the centre of European authority is now transferred to Shanghai, Her Majesty's Government see any objection to the immediate appointment of Mr. Pelham Warren, acting Charge d'Affaires in China.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): As I stated on the 20th instant, Mr. Warren has full powers to take all necessary action, but it is not considered desirable in the present state of affairs to make the change suggested by the question.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON: Might not the appointment be made as a temporary measure?

The question was not answered.

EXPORTS OF MUNITIONS OF WAR TO CHINA.

COLONEL PILKINGTON (Lancashire, Newton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have come to any decision with regard to stopping the export of arms and ammunition from this country to China for the use of the Chinese; and, if so, whether he will communicate the nature of such decision to the House; and whether any ironclads, torpedo boats, or other vessels of war are now being constructed for the Chinese by British firms, or are in course of transit from British builders to the Chinese; and, if so, whether the Government intend to stop these vessels, either on the water or in the building yards.

*MR. BRODRICK: In reply to the first portion of the question the Bill announced by the First Lord of the Treasury in reply to the hon. Member for East Mayo, on Friday last, was introduced in another place on that day, and was read a second time yesterday. No ironclads, torpedo boats, or other vessels of war are now being constructed for the Chinese by British firms in this country. None are in transit from British builders to the Chinese. So far as is known none are under orders from China to be built in the United Kingdom.

RECENT NEWS FROM CHINA.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): Is there any news from China?

*MR. BRODRICK: I am afraid we have no fresh news to communicate.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS INQUIRY.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the persons appointed to report on the arrangements for the care and treatment of the sick and wounded in South Africa will have any, and what, powers to enforce the attendance of witnesses, to examine witnesses on oath, and to compel the production of documents; and, how it is proposed to protect witnesses who give evidence; and whether, with a view to extend to witnesses the protection afforded by The Witnesses (Public Inquiries) Protection Act, 1892, he will consider the propriety of holding the proposed inquiry under the authority of a Royal Commission.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): As the hon. Member is probably aware, there is no power under any form of Commission other than a Statutory Commission to take evidence on oath. This Commission, like all Commissions not directly appointed by Parliament, will therefore be without that power. I understand that the chairman of the Commission has already made public the very elaborate precautions which the Commission propose to take for the protection of witnesses, and I doubt whether any statute would give a protection so absolute. At the same time, as Parliament has passed a statute protecting witnesses before Royal Commissions—a protection which does not extend to commissions otherwise appointed—this Commission will be made a Royal Commission.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the Commission have compulsory powers to insist on bringing witnesses before them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already stated that no Commission not appointed by Parliament except one appointed by statute has those compulsory powers.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: This Commission is a farce.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): Has a Royal Commission which derives its authority from the executive power of the Crown not those compulsory powers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I have twice said so.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: Then I will ask the right hon. Gentleman another question. I admit that it is rather a long question, but it can be briefly answered. In cases of Regular soldiers who believe that they will be marked men and would be ruined for life, and, therefore, will not speak; in the case of more humble people in some kind of active employment in connection with the Army Medical Department who have the same feeling and, therefore, will not speak; in the case of civilian surgeons in the employment of the Army Medical Department and dependent for their daily livelihood on the continuance of that employment and therefore will not speak; and in the case of civilian doctors—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is really delivering a speech and an argument. An answer has been given to the question, but the hon. Member is now proceeding to point out a number of cases in which he considers that witnesses require protection. If more information is required he should give notice of the question.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I had no intention of making a speech, I was only enumerating certain cases with regard to which I desired to ask a question. I will, however, stop the enumeration and will ask the right hon. Gentleman how, with regard to all those cases of people dependent on their employment for their existence, he proposes to obtain such important evidence without compulsory powers, and whether he proposes to give the witnesses protection?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In my opinion the question conveys a perfectly unmerited insult upon persons who do not deserve it at his hands or anybody else's. If the hon. Gentleman will wait until he sees in print the statement made by Lord Justice Romer this morning, he will see what precautions have been taken by the Commission

ATTEMPT TO BLOW UP MAGAZINE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny):
I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State
if he will inquire whether Lieutenant Tossel, of the Transvaal Police, and Mr. Solomon Gillingham have been condemned to death in Pretoria for alleged complicity in a plot to blow up the magazine; and whether he can say if Mr. Gillingham holds military rank in the Republican Army, or what is his occupation; when the trial took place; before what tribunal; what was the evidence of guilt; when the sentence is to be carried into effect; and in what manner.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNDHAM, Dover): There is no information at the War Office in regard to the matter referred to in the question, and it is not proposed to make any inquiry.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Will the hon. Gentleman inquire if the War Office have received any intimation that it is the intention of the Boer military authorities to shoot some important prisoners they hold—among them two Irish lords—if these men are put to death?

BOER WOMEN SENT TO ENEMY'S LINES.

DR. TANNER (Cork County, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the wives of all Boers now alleged to be fighting are ordered to report themselves in order that they may be sent into the enemy's lines; and, if so, can he give the reason for this order.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No information on this matter has reached the War Office.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Will the hon. Gentleman make inquiry?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I see no cause for inquiry.

DR. TANNER: I will put a question again next Tuesday.

DOCTORS AND NURSES IN THE ORANGE RIVER COLONY.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he has any official information showing that, in consequence of the arrangements, out of twenty-four nurses employed in the Orange River Colony, fourteen have succumbed; and whether 100 more doctors and 200 nurses are now required, and stores stacked at base are to be sent up to the front.

MR. WYNDHAM: Eight nurses have died in South Africa. Lord Roberts has quite recently asked for twenty more surgeons and fifty nurses. These are being sent. It is usual for stores to be stacked at the base and sent up as required.

ARTILLERY AMMUNITION SUPPLIES.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what was the reserve of field and horse artillery in this country when the South African Republic declared war; and how many rounds per gun were sent to South Africa with the Army Corps; and how many rounds per gun were sent with the batteries which went from India to Durban; and whether, in order to make up the artillery ammunition required for the war, recourse was had to foreign manufacturers.

MR. WYNDHAM: In introducing a Supplementary Estimate on Friday, I propose to make a statement dealing with reserves of ammunition and other equipment. Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to defer replying to him till then.

INOCULATION AGAINST TYPHOID.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Director General of the Army Medical Department, at the Indian Medical Service dinner on 14th June, stated that the results of inoculation for typhoid, while it afforded some protection against contracting the disease, rather increased the risk of death when contracted, but that this only applied to the men, as both the incidence and case mortality among officers appeared to be increased by inoculation; and whether the recent statistics of Professor Wright, of Netley, which show that both attacks and deaths from typhoid are seven times less in the inoculated than in the uninoculated, applied equally to officers and men separately.

MR. WYNDHAM: I have no knowledge of the statement attributed to the Director General of the Army Medical Department, and, as I have already explained to the House on more than one occasion, the statistics at present available are not sufficient to enable me to give a satisfactory reply to the question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the hon. Gentleman inquire of the Director General if he made the statement?

MR. WYNDHAM: I am not in the habit of asking my friends what they say in after-dinner speeches.

VOLUNTEERS AND GARRISON DUTY.

MR. SEELY (Lincoln): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can state to the House how many Volunteer regiments offered their services to the Government last winter for garrison duty, and whether any were asked to undertake it and were unable to do so.

MR. WYNDHAM: No Volunteer corps has been asked to undertake garrison duty. Sixteen corps offered their services for various purposes in the course of last winter, but it was not found necessary to take advantage of these patriotic offers. It is difficult to give an answer which will not mislead. Excepting regular garrison artillery at military ports, there are no fixed garrisons in this country so long as an attack on it is not apprehended. There is a certain amount of barrack accommodation, and that has been overcrowded since the beginning of the war. At this moment we have 50,000 more Regulars and Militia than we could accommodate in barracks when the camping season is over. So that it would have been impossible to accept offers from Volunteers for home service in the winter.

SMALL ARM AMMUNITION SUPPLIES.

MR. FABER (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, at the time when he stated that it was intended to use Mark IV. ammunition at foreign stations for practice purposes only, what was the amount of other serviceable small arms ammunition available in the country, and when the manufacture of Mark II. ammunition was commenced.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member will no doubt see that it is not expedient to give such information except in general terms. On the date mentioned — namely, 24th July, 1899, taking the authorised reserve at 400 rounds per man armed with a rifle, 200 rounds per man with carbine—infantry, maximum, 28,000; cavalry, maximum, 45,000—we had an excess of 7,000,000 rounds above that reserve so calculated. In spite of the subsequent adoption of Mark V. and readoption of Mark II., we have been able to secure an ample output from the factory to the trade.

STORES BORROWED BY ARMY FROM NAVY.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state when the promised Return of warlike stores borrowed by the Army from the Navy will be laid upon the Table.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The preparation of this Return has been delayed in order to make it as complete as possible in the imperfect state of our information, but it will be laid on the Table to-night, and I hope that advance copies will be available this evening.

SOUTH DENES CAMP—SISTERS OF NAZARETH.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the regulations issued by Colonel Brownrigg, inspecting the Volunteers on the South Denes, Yarmouth, forbidding the Sisters of Nazareth to collect pennies from the 4,000 Volunteers now in camp; whether Colonel Brownrigg has any authority for issuing such regulations; if he is aware that the sisterhood who were sent back are of the same order as that which was so highly commended for nursing the sick and wounded in South Africa; and if there were 1,000 Catholic Volunteers in the camp at the time.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I must apologise to the hon. Member for having unintentionally misinformed him in reply to his former question on this subject. I told him that the matter was within the competence of Colonel Brownrigg, and that the War Office did not interfere. I now learn that a circular was issued by the Adjutant General in October last, prohibiting the practice of ladies entering barracks for the purpose of collecting alms. It was under this order that Colonel Brownrigg acted, and he had, of course, no option but to do so.

PUBLIC SCHOOL ARMY COMMISSIONS—ETON.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether certain commissions for the Army have been allotted to the head master of Eton; and will the recipients be allowed to pass without the usual competitive examination.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Nineteen commissions have been assigned to public schools, of which two have been allotted to Eton. The nominees will be treated like the other recipients of direct commissions, and will not be required to pass a competitive examination.

MAJOR RASCH: What is the reason for this extraordinary preference?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I pointed out some time ago that all those who received direct commissions were to be twenty years of age. I announced that twenty commissions would be given to public schools, and as a matter of fact nineteen have been given.

1ST VOLUNTEER BATTALION LEICESTERS—SUPPLY OF RIFLES.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the 1st Volunteer Battalion Leicesters is 1,560 strong, that they have only (19th July) five rifles to six men, and that they indented for 230 on 5th June, twenty-one on 12th June, and fifty on 12th July, and were informed that none were available; and whether, as they go into camp on Salisbury Plain, 5th August, and must have the arms to earn the additional grant, the War Office will consider the propriety of supplying them.

*MR. WYNDHAM: This battalion has up to date demanded 261 rifles, and these were sent from Weedon on the 17th instant.

THE CHANNEL AND MEDITERRANEAN FLEETS.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether Returns are furnished by the Admirals commanding the Channel and Mediterranean Fleets showing the time spent in harbour, the time spent at sea, the duration and nature of evolutions practised at sea, the state of the weather prevailing during such evolutions, and all such information as may be necessary to enable the Admiralty to record and judge the nature and extent of opportunities given for the sea-training of officers and men of these fleets; and, if so, are such Returns furnished quarterly or half-yearly.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Returns and reports furnished by Admirals in command of squadrons, together with the programmes of their proposed movements which are submitted for approval, are such as to enable the Admiralty to judge of the nature and extent of the cruises taken by them, and of the opportunities for sea-training to the officers and men afforded by them. Some of these Returns are quarterly, but reports of proceedings are received at shorter intervals.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): May I ask whether it is not a fact that the time spent at sea has been singularly short in the last two years?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir.

NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL—LAW OF EVIDENCE.

MR. H. D. GREENE (Shrewsbury): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in fulfilment of his promise, he has consulted the Lords of the Admiralty as to extending the provisions of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, to naval courts martial, and with what result.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir; steps will be taken to extend the provisions of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, to naval courts martial.

PORT GUARDSHIP FOR THE MERSEY—RECRUITING.

MR. CHARLES M'ARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange). I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has considered the desirability of placing a port guardship in the Mersey; or, if that course is impracticable, of arranging for the more frequent visit of one or more of Her Majesty's ships to the port of Liverpool; and whether, having regard to the efforts made locally to arouse public interest in the Navy, and to the number of respectable lads who might volunteer for the service if the opportunity were afforded to them, it would be possible to provide some further facilities for the enlistment and training of recruits for the Royal Navy or Royal Naval Reserve.

MR. GOSCHEN: In 1884 the port guardship was removed to Holyhead, as the Mersey was found an unsuitable anchorage on account of the strong tides and crowded state of the river and great steamer traffic; boat work was difficult, and collisions took place with passing steamers. For these reasons it is not contemplated to again place a ship in the Mersey. The "Northampton" visits Liverpool occasionally for recruiting purposes, and will most likely do so again next year. Her last visit was in 1897. With reference to the last paragraph of the hon. Gentleman's question, recruiting at Liverpool has been quite up to the mark as compared with other recruiting centres.

NORTHERN TERRITORY OF AUSTRALIA.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the administration of the Northern Territory by South Australia is of a permanent or temporary character; what rights, if any, in this territory are still retained by the Imperial Government; and in what relation will the Northern Territory stand towards the Government of the Australian Commonwealth.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The Northern Territory was annexed to South Australia by Letters Patent in 1863, Her Majesty reserving full right to revoke or amend these Letters Patent. So long as these remain unaltered the territory is an integral part of the colony. The Imperial Government have exactly the same rights in the Northern Territory as in any other part of the colony, which will enter the Commonwealth as a whole, and will stand in the same relation to the Government of the Commonwealth as the rest of the colony.

TONGA PROTECTORATE.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now in receipt of detailed official information concerning the circumstances under which a protectorate over Tonga was proclaimed; and, if so, whether such information shows that no protectorate flag was hoisted and no reply given by the Tongan Government to the salute of twenty-one guns fired from H.M.S. "Porpoise."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Mr. Thomson's report has been received and is now under consideration. I do not understand what is meant by a protectorate flag. The British flag is not hoisted when a protectorate is proclaimed, but only when a country is taken possession of by Her Majesty. I am not aware that the circumstances in which the salute was fired by Her Majesty's ship "Porpoise" were such as to call for a reply from the Tonga Government. I may state, however, that in accordance with the usual practice in protectorates the British flag was hoisted by the Tongan Government alongside the Tongan flag on Her Majesty's birthday, and duly saluted with twenty-one guns.

INDIAN FAMINE—PRIVATE CHARITY.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, with a view to stimulate liberality in subscriptions to the Indian Famine Fund, he will, by a detailed statement, make clear to the public what branches of relief are undertaken by the Indian Government and what branches are dependent upon private charity; and whether he can give a rough estimate of the total expenditure required from the Government of India and from private charity respectively in order to deal suitably with the present calamity.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): If the hon. Baronet will read any of the statements which I have sent to the Lord Mayor, or the various published letters I have written to the different organisations who have been, and are collecting funds for the Indian Charitable Famine Fund, he will there find clearly stated the branches of relief work undertaken by the Government and the subsidiary spheres of work reserved for charity. As regards the second question, the hon. Baronet will perhaps allow me to reserve till Thursday the general and detailed statement I shall be ready to make upon the famine expenditure.

CANADA AND THE INDIAN FAMINE.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that in April last several Members of the Canadian House of Commons urged the Colonial Government to make a substantial grant to the Indian famine fund; and that the Premier, in reply, announced that the Government was in communication with the Home authorities on the subject; and whether he can state what was the result of this communication.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes; I have seen the report of the discussion to which the hon. Member refers. I have not yet, however, received any communication from the Dominion Government on the subject.

RANGOON OUTRAGE—COMMAND OF THE ROYAL WEST KENT REGIMENT.

SIR LEWIS M'IVER (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether Brigadier General Rolland was removed from his command as Brigadier on the ground of alleged apathy and inaction in what is known as the Royal West Kent Regiment case; and, if so, whether the Secretary of State can name any specific act or omission on the part of Colonel Rolland justifying this charge; and whether he can state anything in the matter which Colonel Rolland could have done, or ought to have done, and which he failed to do.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The ground upon which Colonel Rolland was removed from his command in connection with the gross outrage committed at Rangoon in April, 1899, was that, being in immediate command at Rangoon, and primarily responsible for discipline at the station, he showed an apathy and inaction which conduced to a miscarriage of justice. His case was most carefully considered by the Commander in Chief in India, by the Government of India, and by myself in Council; and, in allowing Colonel Rolland to remain in the Service, I adopted the most lenient course that was open to me under the circumstances.

FIELD BATTERIES IN INDIA.

MR. CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether no such decision, tending to the reduction of guns in heavy field batteries in India, has been taken, as is suggested in the Blue-book containing the financial statement and debate in the Viceroy's Council, recently laid before Parliament.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The question of the conversion of four heavy field batteries of four guns each into two howitzer batteries of six guns each is inseparably connected with other large questions of artillery organisation which are under consideration in communication with the War Office, and it has not yet been decided.

RECEIVING HOMES FOR PAUPER CHILDREN.

MR. FLOWER (Bradford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Lambeth Guardians have accepted the suggestion of the Board to establish a receiving home for pauper children; and, if not, whether the Board are prepared to insist upon their proposal being carried out.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The guardians have not yet accepted the suggestion made by the Local Government Board in this matter, and the Board are still in communication with them on the subject.

FEEBLE-MINDED PAUPERS.

MR. FLOWER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is able to comply with the request contained in the memorial presented to him by the Association for Promoting the Welfare of the Feeble-Minded, and will cause an inquiry to be held as to the number and condition of feeble-minded paupers, not certifiable as lunatics.

MR. CHAPLIN: This matter is receiving my consideration, and I propose in the first instance to endeavour to obtain from the guardians information with respect to the number and condition of persons of the class referred to who are in workhouses.

WANDSWORTH GUARDIANS AND DESERTED CHILDREN.

MR. FLOWER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been drawn to the issue of a public notice by the Wandsworth Board of Guardians, in which a free pardon was offered to the parents of some 300 children who should reclaim them on a given date; can he state whether the issue of such notice was sanctioned by the Local Government Board; and, whether they have addressed any communication to the guardians on the matter.

MR. CHAPLIN: I have made inquiry on this subject, and I am informed that a committee of the guardians, in going through the list of children chargeable to the Union, found that there were between two and three hundred cases in which the parents had been lost sight of, and in very few of which the guardians could prove desertion or take any proceedings. The notice is stated to have been issued for the purpose of inviting parents, who had left their children for years, to call on the guardians and arrange to take their children away. In consequence of the notice about thirty children were handed over to their parents. No sanction to the notice was given by the Local Government Board. The notice appears to me to have been open to objection, and a letter has been sent to the guardians pointing this out, and stating that in the opinion of the Board the practice of issuing such a notice should be discontinued.

TUBERCULOSIS IN WEST CHESHIRE.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he is aware that at a recent meeting of the Northwich Rural Council a communication was received from the county medical officer of health, Dr. Vacher, stating that he was informed by the medical officer of health for Manchester that a cow with a tuberculosis udder had been found on a farm in West Cheshire; that Dr. Nevin wrote to Dr. Vacher advising to isolate the infected cow, to dry her at once, and have her fed for slaughter; whether the Local Government Board have sanctioned such a system; and whether he is aware that Dr. Vacher, in conjunction with the late Inspector Wagstaffe, inaugurated and carried out a series of tuberculosis prosecutions in Birkenhead.

MR. CHAPLIN: The facts appear to be substantially as stated in the first paragraph of the question. The cow, however, was not sold, but was destroyed by the farmer. The answer to the second paragraph of the question is in the negative. Dr. Vacher, before becoming county medical officer was medical officer of health for Birkenhead, and I am informed that during this period the Birkenhead Town Council, as advised by him, arranged for a much more thorough inspection of meat intended for the food of man than had previously been attempted, and appointed Mr. Wagstaffe to give his whole time to the work. Dr. Vacher appears, however, to have had nothing to do with the present case, except to inform the Northwich Rural District Council of the communication he had received from Dr. Nevin.

WIMBLEDON—PROPOSED SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. PRICE (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Education Department has received the resolution adopted by the ratepayers of Wimbledon on 9th July, asking for a school board for the parish; and whether an order for the election has been issued; if not, when it will be issued.

HOLYHEAD NATIONAL SCHOOL—RELIGIOUS FREEDOM OF TEACHERS.

MR. ELLIS J. GRIFFITH (Anglesey): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the fact that repeated demands have been made by the Education Department upon the managers of the Holyhead National School that they should sign the memorandum of agreement of Nellie Roberts, a pupil teacher at the infants' department of that school, but that, although she has been a recognised pupil teacher for over three years, these demands have not yet been complied with; and what reasons are assigned by the managers for their non-compliance.

SIR J. GORST: Notice of this question was only received this morning, and I have not yet been able to obtain the information.

MR. ELLIS J. GRIFFITH: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that, on the 11th of April last, the Rev. Canon Thomas, one of the managers of the Holyhead National School, called Nellie Roberts and another pupil teacher before him, in the presence of the head teachers, and after inquiring of each if they were willing to attend the services of the Church of England and to assist in the Sunday School, and being answered by the first negatively and by the second affirmatively, that he proceeded to sign the memorandum of agreement of the latter and informed Nellie Roberts that he would leave her agreement unsigned for a time, so as to give her an opportunity of deciding whether she would comply with his demands that she should renounce her Nonconformity; and will he cause inquiry to be made in this case.

SIR J. GORST: The Board of Education have no control over the conditions in respect of religion under which pupil teachers are engaged. But I will inquire into the allegations of the hon. Member.

MR. ELLIS J. GRIFFITH: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, whether he is aware that the managers of the Holyhead National School habitually bring pressure to bear upon all their teachers to attend Church of England services and to be confirmed, and that out of nine Nonconformists employed at the school seven have been obliged to comply with these demands, although the parents are Nonconformists, and that this is the only school available for a Nonconformist district; and whether, seeing that repeated applications by the Holyhead School Board to be allowed to build a school have been refused, and that the National school is generally overcrowded, he will state what steps the Board of Education will take in this matter.

SIR J. GORST: The Board of Education have no power to interfere in a matter of this kind. I will inquire into the matter referred to in the second paragraph.

MR. ELLIS J. GRIFFITH: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the fact that nearly all the pupil teachers in the Holyhead National School are paid one shilling per week less than the amount agreed upon by the managers and specified in their memoranda of agreement; and what measures the Board of Education intend taking to enforce the proper carrying out of Clauses 1 and 3 of the memorandum of agreement.

SIR J. GORST: No complaint of the non-fulfilment by the managers of the Holyhead National School of the conditions of their agreement with pupil teachers has, so far as I know, reached the Board of Education. If such complaint were made it would at once be inquired into.

SCIENCE AND ART INSTRUCTION IN LONDON BOARD SCHOOLS.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Hertfordshire, Hertford): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that numerous scholars nominally in public elementary schools under the London School Board, who receive instruction exclusively under the regulations of the Science and Art Directory and not under the Code, have their attendances registered both on the registers of the Science and Art Department and in duplicate on the attendance books of the public elementary schools; and that this duplicate registration brings the cost of the instruction so given to science and art scholars into the accounts of the ordinary elementary school, and thus causes it to be paid for out of the School Board rate levied for elementary education only; and whether, seeing that this registration of science and art scholars on the books of the public elementary school is prohibited by Clause 18 of the Science and Art Directory, he will state what steps he has taken or proposes to take in the matter.

SIR J. GORST: The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The Board of Education have refused to pay Science and Art Grants in respect of any scholar registered in the manner described.

MR. EVELYN CECIL: Does my right hon. friend mean that the officials of the Board of Education have been sustaining what I cannot but describe as a serious public fraud?

GENERAL POST OFFICE—REMOVAL TO MOUNT PLEASANT—OVERTIME ALLOWANCES.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if the London postmen whose deliveries have been protracted by the recent removal to St. Martin's-le-Grand, and particulars of whose cases have already been submitted to him, are to be paid for the overtime thus worked.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): Yes, Sir; arrangements are in progress for distributing the payments for overtime.

LONDON POSTAL DELAYS—SUGGESTED INQUIRY.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, in view of the fact that sorters and postmen have been charged by officials of the Department with malingering and with being responsible for recent postal delays in London, he will appoint a Committee to inquire with whom the responsibility really rests.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Postmaster General informs me that, as far as he is aware, no definite charges of the kind referred to by the hon. Member have been made. There seems to be no useful purpose likely to be served by such a Commission as he suggests.

MR. STEADMAN: Although, perhaps, the Postmaster General has not heard of the charges made against the men, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that officials under the Postmaster General have brought charges against the men in the public press?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of that. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give me some information as to the details, but at present the information is not in harmony with that I have received from the Postmaster General.

MR. STEADMAN: I will take the earliest opportunity afforded by the rules of the House to state the case of the men to the right hon. Gentleman.

THE WIDENING OF PICCADILLY.

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-on-Trent): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has made any proposal to the County Council to add part of the Green Park to Piccadilly, and whether his proposal will be submitted to the House of Commons.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. AKERS DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): I have made a proposal to the London County Council to the effect that if they will undertake the cost of widening Piccadilly, according to a plan which has been laid before them, I will endeavour to procure the necessary Royal Warrant to obtain a strip of the Green Park required for the purpose. The work, if carried out according to the plan, will in no way injure the park, but will confer an immense boon upon the public at large. I shall be very happy to explain the plan to my hon. friend, and will see that it is placed in the Tea Room for the inspection of hon. Members. As no public money is involved, no Estimate will be submitted to Parliament, but the question could, of course, be discussed on Class II., Vote 25, which still remains to be taken. The procedure in this case is in exact accordance with those precedents where land has been taken from Royal parks for the purpose of widening public streets, where no other conditions are involved.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): To what extent will the road be widened?

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS: For the greater portion of the way it will be practically 70 feet wide, and wider at Park Lane.

DIETARY IN IRISH WORKHOUSES.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for South Monaghan, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at a recent meeting of the Halstead Board of Guardians, Mr. Bagenal, Local Government Board Inspector, said that the Local Government Board would soon issue an order putting the guardians of the workhouse on a different footing with regard to the dietary of the inmates; whether he is aware that Mr. Bagenal said that the guardians would not be tied down to any particular dietary, and that so long as nutritious food was given to the inmates the Local Government Board would not interfere; and whether he can say if he will direct the Local Government Board in Ireland to give greater freedom to the guardians in Ireland in their treatment of the poor and management of the workhouses, as the Local Government Board in England are about doing with the English Boards of Guardians.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I have no information regarding the first and second paragraphs. With reference to the third paragraph, boards of guardians in Ireland, provided they do not reduce their scale of dietary below the minimum scale laid down by the General Regulations, have practically quite as free a hand as the English boards in carrying out any improvements or variations in the dietary which their medical officer suggests. The minimum scale now in force in Ireland was fixed in the year 1849, when the standard of comfort of the poorer classes was very much lower than it is at present, but as the boards of guardians have been gradually improving the dietary of workhouse inmates it has not been found necessary to bind the guardians down to any new or uniform scale. A considerable difference, however, exists in the scales of dietary in use in the various workhouses throughout Ireland, and many are open to much improvement. In November last the Local Government Board addressed a circular to the several boards of guardians calling attention to this diversity and expressing the opinion that the existing dietaries might, in many instances, be revised on more varied lines with regard to the dietary of the children, the infirm and lunatic classes. The Board requested the guardians, after consultation with their medical officer, to take the matter into consideration, and also forwarded for the guardians' information a copy of a suggested dietary scale. As a result, a number of unions have adopted either the scale suggested by the Board or some modification of it.

IRISH LAND PURCHASE—THE ASHBOURNE ACT.

CAPTAIN DONELAN : On behalf of the hon. Member for South Monaghan, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that purchasers of land in Ireland under the Ashbourne Act are not placed in as favourable a position as purchasers under the Land Purchase Acts of 1892 and 1896, both with regard to the sinking fund and a reduction of the instalments every ten years; and whether, seeing that purchasers under the Ashbourne Acts bought when judicial rents were higher, he will consider the necessity and justice of placing these purchasers on as good terms as the purchasers under the Land Purchase Acts of 1892 and 1896 with reference to the sinking fund and payment of future instalments.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : On the 3rd inst. I replied very fully to a similar question addressed by me to the hon. Member for South Monaghan,* and to that reply I have nothing to add.

BOATING IN HOWTH HARBOUR.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN : On behalf of the hon. Member for Dublin County, N., I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that at the last Howth (county Dublin) Petty Sessions, four boatmen were prosecuted at the suit of the Royal Irish Constabulary for plying for hire with their boats in Howth Harbour without having obtained the necessary licence from the Board of Works; can he state who authorised the constabulary to prosecute; and whether it is a part of their duty to act for the Board of Works when required to do so by that body; and whether it is the intention of the Government to enforce the payment of the fines or costs that have been imposed in the cases referred to.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : The prosecutions in these cases were at the suit, not of the constabulary, but of the Commissioners of Public Works. The police do not act for the Commissioners in matters of this kind. As regards the last paragraph, the question of the enforcement of the fines or costs is one for the consideration of the Board of Works.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN : On behalf of the hon. Member for Dublin County, N., I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the case of four boatmen who were last week prosecuted at Howth (county Dublin) Petty Sessions for plying for hire with boats without a licence from the Board of Works; whether it was with the sanction of the Board of Works that this prosecution was instituted; and whether, if the Board of Works insist on boatmen who ply for hire with boats obtaining a licence to do so, it will cause the harbour to be so dredged that it will not be necessary, as the boatmen referred to declared, to carry passengers on their backs across a portion of Howth Harbour.

MR. HANBURY : The prosecution was instituted by the Board of Works, who are the Commissioners of the harbour. In three of the cases no licence had been taken out for two years, and in the fourth case for four years. Dredging is impracticable over about half of the harbour because of the rockiness of the bed. But it is carried on where feasible at the East Pier, and in any case several flights of steps are available for embarking and landing passengers both at the east and west pier at all states of the tide. The harbour master reports that he has never seen nor heard of licensed boatmen having to carry passengers on their backs to reach the boats.

FAIR RENT APPEALS IN CORK.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that only one sitting of a Sub-commission for the hearing of fair rent applications has been held in the Cork Union during the present year, and that at that sitting no case was listed in which the notice was served later than December, 1898; and whether any steps will be taken to expedite the hearing of pending fair rent applications.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : The most recent list of fair rent applications for hearing in the County Cork contains all cases from the union of Cork in which the applications were received prior to Christmas 1898. A Sub-commission has sat in Cork upon two occasions during the present year. There are only forty-one cases from that district received to the present date which have not yet been listed for hearing.

BELFAST POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

SIR JAMES HASLETT (Belfast, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that in the districts of Belfast, Fortwilliam, Lisburn Road, Malone Road, Belmont, and Bloomfield, the latest delivery of letters is four o'clock in the evening; and whether steps will be taken to have a later delivery arranged for.

MR. HANBURY: Portions of Lisburn Road and Malone Road are within the town delivery of Belfast, and have a delivery of letters commencing as late as 8 p.m. The remaining portions of those roads and the other places referred to by the hon. Member are outside the town postal district, and the latest delivery takes place at about 4 p.m. as stated by the hon. Member. The question of giving a later delivery in those districts will be considered.

NEWBLISS RURAL POSTMAN.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that William Taylor, rural postman, Newbliss, attended the Orange demonstration at Clones on the 12th inst., and performed as a drummer, in one of the party bands upon that occasion; and does conduct of this kind on the part of postmen receive the sanction of the Department, or will any remonstrance be addressed to Taylor.

MR. HANBURY: William Taylor is employed about four hours a day as a rural auxiliary postman at Newbliss. He attended at the Orange demonstration at Clones, and acted as drummer. He was off duty at the time, and was not in uniform, and the matter is not one of which it is thought necessary to take any official notice.

WEST CLARE FISHERIES.

MAJOR JAMESON (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland, in reference to the recent deputation and correspondence on the subject of assistance being given by the Government to the fishing industry of West Clare, will the Department of Agriculture give assistance in aid of the fishing industry in West Clare; and, if so, what sum will the Department of Agriculture allocate to West Clare out of the grant by Government voted for that purpose.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKETT, Dublin County, S.): The Department is considering what steps may be taken to develop the fishing industry in West Clare. The amount of money available for the purpose cannot be stated until the requirements of other districts are ascertained.

SALARIES OF IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in numerous instances the salaries of Irish National teachers for the quarter ended 30th June have been delayed in payment beyond the day appointed for the purpose by the Commissioners, and that this delay has occurred notwithstanding that the quarterly returns were received in the Education Office in due time and in correct form; and, whether he will inquire into the causes of the delay, and if steps will be taken to guard against a repetition of this irregularity, which is productive of inconvenience to the teachers.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The salaries of the teachers have not been delayed in payment in numerous cases as stated, when the claims were received in due time and were regular in form. If any specific case of delay is brought under the notice of the Commissioners, they will, as they always have done, order a strict investigation into the matter.

MONEY-LENDING BILL [Lords].

Reported from the Standing Committee on Law, etc., with Amendments.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 297.]

Minutes of Proceedings of the Standing Committee to be printed. [No. 297.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 312.]

COMPANIES BILL.

As amended (by the Standing Committee) considered.

*MR. SPEAKER: The motion on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Northampton is not in order, as this is a Bill to amend the law relating to registered companies only, and does not relate to chartered companies.

A Clause (Application of the Act to Scotland)—(The Lord Advocate)—brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton): I beg to move that Clause 2 be omitted.

Question proposed, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford): I suppose the right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill will also accept the omission of the following clause?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): I find myself unable to resist the Amendment of my hon. and gallant friend. As those who are acquainted with what took place in the Grand Committee will remember, I made a similar recommendation there, but it was not adopted by the Committee. I will state the reason why I now feel bound to accept the Amendment. I do not propose to enter into the merits of this clause or of the next one. I admit that there are evils which require to be remedied, but I do not desire to commit myself to the particular mode of amendment embodied in these clauses. My main reason for assenting to the Amendment of my hon. friend is that in my opinion these clauses are not germane to the Bill, and I think that to attempt to introduce definitions as to what businesses may or may not be carried on by a company would be to run counter to all precedent, and would cause excessive inconvenience. Therefore, as I desire to say nothing against the principle of the clauses, I suggest to the House that it would do well to accept the Amendment and omit these two clauses.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): When this Bill was before the Grand Committee I expressed the opinion that it would be better to leave these clauses out of the Bill, as they had nothing whatever to do with its main object and scope. They relate to an extremely important subject, which I am inclined to think should be dealt with even more strongly than is proposed in these clauses. But I repeat that it would be better to omit this portion of the Bill altogether, as it raises an entirely different set of questions to that dealt with by the rest of the Bill.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Considering that everybody connected with the Bill is under the belief that the clauses have nothing whatever to do with it, I think some explanation should be afforded us as to how they got into the Bill. Can the President of the Board of Trade explain how, in spite of the forms and orders of the House, clauses were inserted in a Bill with which they had nothing whatever to do?

MR. RITCHIE: The clauses were put in the Bill in the House of Lords, and I, of course, am not capable of explaining the reasons why. As, however, they were inserted, I deemed it only right and courteous to the House that the Bill should be introduced here in the form in which it was sent down last session.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: That renders it more inexplicable than ever. The House of Lords sent the Bill to a Select Committee, which was charged with the duty of crossing the "t's" and dotting the "i's," and I therefore cannot comprehend how they came to pass clauses which the President of the Board of Trade and his predecessor are both agreed have been improperly inserted. Under the circumstances, of course the House will agree to their omission.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I hope that the House will not do anything of the kind. These clauses are the result of a great deal of consideration. They have been introduced into this Bill in two successive sessions, and they were also introduced in a separate Bill. The Lord Chancellor, in introducing the Bill, deliberately recommended these clauses as the best method of regulating certain dangers and difficulties to which the public are exposed under the existing state of the law. It was done after deliberate consultation with persons affected. I am perfectly aware that I cannot discuss the merits of Clause 3 at the present time, although the right hon. Gentleman has indicated that that clause will have to go if the one now under discussion is omitted. I feel bound in the public interest to support the retention of the clause. I feel that in yielding the right hon. Gentleman is yielding to the clamour of a class, because the clause interferes to a certain extent with large trading concerns. If the clauses are not retained I feel that an opportunity will have been lost of putting on the Statute-book provision likely to be of great good to the public by protecting them against many forms of illegal practice in pharmacy, medicine, and dentistry. I speak in the interest of the public, and I hope the House will consider carefully before it yields to a panic on the part of the right hon. Gentleman caused by the opposition of certain trade interests.

SIR JAMES HASLETT (Belfast, N.) said the second clause proposed that a company should be entitled to assume a title which no individual might take unless he passed a certain examination. Surely that was a bad policy. He did not claim any special immunity so far as Ireland was concerned. They might start as many companies as they liked there. It was a poor country, its business was poor. If a man got a Sunday dinner, he lived on the recollection of it for two or three days, and then he lived on the anticipation of another Sunday dinner for the rest of the week. But he did ask the House to be true to itself. It had passed a Pharmaceutical Act which required a man to pass an examination before he was entitled to do certain things or to assume a certain title. Now it was proposed to absolutely wipe out that qualification, and to enable a company to carry on the business without examination; the only point in its favour being that it was possessed of pounds, shillings, and pence. He thought the Government had very wisely decided that these clauses had nothing whatever to do with a Companies Bill, and should therefore be omitted.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.): I should not have intervened in this discussion had it not been for the suggestion that the Government in agreeing to the omission of these clauses was yielding to clamour. I entirely share the views of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that the clauses are alien to the Bill. I hold that our statutes should be so framed that they can be easily determined; they should not contain cross references which only lead to confusion, and therefore a Bill dealing with company law ought not to contain legislation affecting chemists, who are subject to a different Act of Parliament. I therefore hope the House will agree to the omission of these clauses.

*COLONEL LONG (Worcestershire, Evesham) expressed the opinion that the reasons put forward by the President of the Board of Trade for the rejection of the clauses—namely, that they were not germane to the Bill—were not sufficiently strong to justify their omission. The object of the Bill was to do away with certain abuses in our system of trading by companies. Abuses were believed to exist by means of which people who were not qualified chemists and dentists carried on those businesses, to the danger of the public. The Lord Chancellor, who was supposed to understand evidence, had been convinced that such abuses did exist, and ought to be remedied, therefore he inserted the clauses, and they ought not to be thrown out on the weak grounds stated.

*SIR J. B. TUKE (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities) also regretted that Clause 3 was to be dropped, as its operation would have put a stop to practices which served to paralyse the action of the Medical Acts in certain important particulars. Under the law as it now stood persons in no way connected with the medical profession were able to form companies, the object of which was to act as physicians, surgeons, and dentists. Over such companies the Medical Council could exercise no jurisdiction, and one of the main objects of the Medical Acts was inoperative. The public were the sufferers, as it was rendered impossible to distinguish between qualified and non-qualified practitioners. He recognised that the clause was not germane to the general terms of the Bill, but he felt so strongly on the subject that next session he would take an early opportunity to introduce a Bill dealing with it.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to move the omission of Clause 3. I can only express my satisfaction that the President of the Board of Trade has agreed to the omission of this clause.

Question, that Clause 3 stand part of the Bill, put and negatived.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I have to move the omission from Clause 4 of the following words—

“(ii) either signed the Memorandum of Association for a number of shares not less than his qualification (if any) or signed and filed with the registrar a contract in writing to take from the company and pay for his qualification shares (if any).”

The law as it at present stands requires that a director of a company shall qualify for his position by taking up the number of shares defined in the Articles of Association. It is not unusual, I believe, for directors of companies to receive their qualifications from the promoters, and if I understand the object of the right hon. Gentleman aright, it is, by including this clause in the Bill, to prevent directors of companies from receiving their qualifications from the promoters. In other words, he desires to deal with that class of directors described as “guinea-pig” directors. But the Bill will not effect that object, because I observe that, by a later clause, on page 8, there is a provision that the director is to make a statement “of all sums paid or agreed to be paid to him in cash or shares by any person, either to qualify him as a director or otherwise, for services rendered by him in connection with the formation of the company.” Therefore, I take it, the very evil which this clause is intended to defeat is countenanced and regulated by a subsequent clause. I agree that very considerable evil attaches to the provision of qualifications for directors. There are two grounds for resisting the inclusion of this clause in the Bill. The first is that it does not attain the object in view, because it is quite possible to have an elusive arrangement with intending directors to defeat the object aimed at by this provision. But the second is a far more important reason. Suppose a man is invited to serve on a board, and he is to receive a salary, by way of director's fees, of £200 a year. He may be a peer of the realm, a Member of Parliament, an ex-Governor General, or some other more or less distinguished personage. His qualification is to be £200, and it is obvious that he will have no difficulty in finding it, for he is not going to deprive himself of this opportunity of earning £200 a year. It will, therefore, be perfectly easy for him to enter into an arrangement of a nature which it will not be necessary to disclose. Another very forcible reason is that you are making a law which you cannot effectively enforce. It is most desirable that obvious acts of misconduct in connection with the formation and maintenance of companies should, as far as possible, be checked by legislation. But if you lay down a moral law which it is impossible effectively to enforce, you at once bring your legislation into contempt, and you defeat the very object which you have in view. On the ground that these words are calculated to produce further elusive acts of fraud, and to accentuate the evil which it is desired to suppress, I beg to move the omission of these words.

Amendment proposed—

“In page 2, line 19, to leave out paragraph (ii.), of Sub-section (1), of Clause 4.”—(Mr. Atherley-Jones.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out to the word ‘for,’ in line 19, stand part of the Bill.”

MR. RITCHIE: The object of this sub-section is clear. It is to secure that under all circumstances, and in all cases, a director shall qualify himself, and shall not receive his qualification from anyone else. I imagine it is quite possible, if the qualification is £200, and he is to receive a salary of £200 a year, for a man to qualify himself by taking shares to the extent of £200. But I do think it a wise thing that gentlemen who put themselves forward as directors of companies should give some security that they have an interest in the company, and should provide themselves with the necessary shares and pay for them. If the hon. Gentleman's Amendment is accepted that security will be done away with.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: What about Clause 12?

MR. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth): The object of the clause is a highly desirable one, seeing that it is to secure that the director shall not be a mere bogus creature, but that he shall have a substantial interest in the company. That is manifestly a good idea. But still it seems to me it is obvious that if a company which is a reprehensible company desires to have upon its directorate any particular class of person it will be able to secure its object by the simple expedient of reducing the qualification to a nominal amount. I do not think the clause will have the effect anticipated in the case of an unsubstantial or questionable company, but still it would be as well that the words should be retained as some protection against the impecunious or "guinea-pig" director.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said it did not appear to him that it was possible to secure that a director should pay for his own shares. He might borrow the necessary money on the understanding that it should be paid back out of his fees as director. In fact, he might get over the difficulty in a hundred different ways. But the object of the clause, as he understood it, was to secure that the public should know how many shares each director had. It seemed to him, although he very much doubted whether the clause would afford any real security against the directors obtaining their qualification from promoters, it would be an advantage to the public that they should know how many shares each particular director held.

MR. ATHERLEY - JONES: I beg to ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft) said he desired to move the omission from the same section of the words "for a number of shares not less than his qualification." He took it that the object of his right hon. friend was not to deter good men from coming forward as directors, but he feared that this particular provision might act as a deterrent unless his Amendment was accepted. A gentleman might be asked to join a board of directors, and this section required that he should take up his qualifying shares at a time when he did not know whether or not the company would go to allotment. The qualification might be £500, and he might be willing to subscribe that amount conditionally that the company went to allotment. But this clause required that he should pay it down, whether the company went to allotment or not. What would be the result? In the case of a company which was registered but did not go to allotment a wrecking solicitor might be tempted to petition for a winding-up order, as he would be sure of his costs, because he would have a number of directors to go against, each of whom would be liable to the amount of his qualifying shares. The effect must be to deter good men from taking any responsibility in the initial stages of a company, whereas he took it that one of the chief objects of the President of the Board of Trade was to secure that good men should become connected with a company at its very inception.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 19, to leave out the words from the word 'association,' to the word 'or,' in line 20."—(Mr. H. S. Foster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. RITCHIE said he had no reason to find fault with his hon. friend for putting the Amendment on the Paper. What was wanted was that everybody should know what a director's qualification was. He was afraid that whatever risk a director had to run as to whether or not the company would float or not, the director must be left to bear it. He did not think that any inconvenience such as his hon. friend suggested had ensued from the present state of the law, which put directors in the same position in regard to qualifying shares. All that was wanted was that the directors should really take and pay for the necessary qualifying shares.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) said he would agree with the hon. Gentleman if he thought that the Bill as it stood would produce the consequences the hon. Gentleman feared. But he would point out that it was not obligatory on the director to sign the Memorandum of Association; he might sign and file with the registrar a contract in writing to take and pay for the qualifying shares. If the proposed director was under any apprehension such as was referred to by the hon. Gentleman, he was at liberty to take the second alternative.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) thought the clause as it stood might deter useful men from becoming directors.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall) hoped that the President of the Board of Trade would accept the Amendment he now proposed. Suppose the prospectus was for the issue of debentures only, and all the shares had been already subscribed, it would be impossible for a large shareholder to become a director to have his name in the prospectus unless, in addition to the shares he had already got, he were to sign and register a contract to take the qualification shares from the company, though it had none to sell.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 22, at the end, to insert the words, 'or a certificate signed by the secretary or acting secretary of the company that he is the registered holder of his qualification shares, if any.'—(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said there was a very great difference between the alternative which his hon. friend asked the House to accept and Sub-section 2 of Clause 4. That sub-section endeavoured to secure—whether it would be effective for the purpose or not time only would show—that the proposed director should enter into a contract to take and pay for his qualifying shares. If the Amendment were accepted, all that it would be necessary to do in order to comply with the provision would be for a qualified director or shareholder to transfer into the name of the proposed director certain qualifying shares. There was nothing in the Amendment to show that the qualifying shares should belong to the director, or that he had entered into a contract to buy them. He could not accept the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. H. S. FOSTER, in moving the next Amendment, said that the all-important thing was the issue of the prospectus. The directors might not be appointed at the time of the registration of the Memorandum and Articles of Association.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 24, after the word 'company,' to insert the words 'or of the prospectus.'—(Mr. H. S. Foster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY submitted that the House ought not to accept the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 30, to leave out the word 'passing,' and insert the word 'commencement.'—(Mr. H. S. Foster.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'passing' stand part of the Bill."

MR. RITCHIE could not see that there was any hardship in applying this portion of the Bill to a company registered before the passing into law instead of at 1st January, 1901.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE said the Amendment he now moved would carry out what must be the intention of the Government in Clause 4. "Does" could only relate to the moment of registering, and an invitation given a few days later would defeat the object. He desired to secure it by exchanging something definite for what was vague.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 31, to leave out the words 'does not issue,' and insert the words 'is prohibited by its memorandum or articles of association from issuing.'—(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'does not issue' stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) said the section was introduced for the protection of the public in cases where a company went to the public asking subscriptions for shares. He did not see what the object of the Amendment was.

MR. PERKS said this was a most important question to the investing public. They must not forget that they were dealing with £1,500,000,000 of money invested in this country, and it was very important that they should have some definition or explanation from the authors of the Bill as to what was meant by invitation to the public. Many hon. Members had not had the opportunity of listening to the discussions in the Grand Committee, and they were hopelessly ignorant of what was the meaning of the phrase.

*MR. MARKS (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said the portion of the Bill now under consideration dealt with certain things which were to be done before the registration of the articles, and the provision that this particular section should not apply to any company which did not issue an invitation to the public suggested three or four varying and conflicting possibilities. It was impossible to issue an invitation to the public before registration, and there was no period set at which the company was to issue an invitation, if an invitation was to be issued. The suggestion which the section conveyed to his mind was that these formalities were to be complied with before registration, when it was obviously impossible for the company, even if it intended to issue an invitation to the public, to do so, and there was no provision that they might go back to the registrar later on for the purpose of complying with the formalities. There was another point. There seemed to be an idea in the mind of the hon. Gentleman the Attorney General, that the shares which reached the public, and in respect of which there was a general desire that every care and precaution should be taken, were those taken by the public in response to a magical appeal called "invitation to the public." Nothing of the kind was the case. In a large number of cases where investors had lost heavily by abortive enterprises there had been no such thing as an invitation to the public to subscribe, nor had there been any necessity for it. What was done, and what this Bill did not prevent from being done, was this—a company was formed without even such safeguards as were provided by the publication of a prospectus. A company was formed in a hole and corner way by a promoter and a few others, and the shares were allotted to the promoter's nominees. A pool of these shares was then made, and the services of a few highly respectable jobbers were engaged in order to have the shares floated on the Stock Exchange—one lot at £1, the next at £2, and the next at £3. No prospectus was issued which could be produced in court, but perambulating prospectuses were employed in the form of joint stock promoters or jobbers who gave inspired tips that the shares were going to £4 or £5. Frequently they did go to £4 or £5. The prices were matters of public record. It was thus that great transactions were carried out. The very company which this Bill would exempt from every safeguard was the company in respect of which the public most required protection—the company whose directors floated the concern, which had no prospectus, because they issued no invitation to the public. So far as this clause was concerned it was rendered nugatory by the provision of Sub-section 3. It was precisely that company to which the section should apply. It was precisely that company in respect of which the public wished to be protected, the company whose shares were bought by the public at a high premium. They could always trust the investor to invest unwisely, and to wish afterwards to wreak his vengeance on somebody. In the present state of the law the investor could still invest unwisely, and, having lost his money he was at a loss to discover the director responsible for the prospectus, or even to ascertain the office of the company in which he had lost his money. If some limit were put to the period during which a company would have the option of deciding whether or not an invitation to the public should be issued, there might be something to be said for this sub-section; but as it stood it was useless. It was apparently senseless, but it would be less senseless if the Amendment of his hon. and learned friend were accepted; but he was by no means sure that it would be less useless.

SIR ROBERT REID said his regret was that this Bill did not deal with the making of a market in company shares, and did not, therefore, deal with one of the greatest vices or frauds which were common in company promotion. As far as the particular Amendment under con-consideration was concerned, he did not think they need trouble to go into the question. But the question was, whether the clause was to have a wide or a comparatively restricted application. The Government proposed that the clause should not apply in the case of companies which did not issue an invitation to the public. That was rather wide. Though he did not attach very much importance to the clause, and though he did not think it would have so great a beneficial effect as the Government hoped, at the same time it was a good clause so far as it went. He wished to have it as widely applied as possible, and, therefore, for that reason he should support the Amendment proposed by the hon. Gentleman. He would ask the Government whether they might not accede to it.

MR. MCLAREN (Leicestershire, Bosworth) said he thought the intention was that the clause should not apply to private firms which were registered as limited liability companies, and which divided the capital amongst the partners of the concerns. If that was the intention of the Bill, surely some form of words might be found which would clearly express that intention, so as to prevent inconvenience arising from the rather loose wording of the clause as it stood. All they had to do if they wished to evade the penal section was that somebody should say it was not intended to issue shares to the public. The directors might pass a resolution to that effect, and after an interval of eight or nine months a prospectus might be issued when it would be absolutely too late to apply Sub-section 1. The clause as it stood would open the door to every kind of evasion, and if it had any meaning at all would lead to endless litigation.

*SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said he very much doubted whether it was possible to draw a logical or legal distinction between the two classes of companies—namely, public and private companies. This subject was, however, very much discussed in the Departmental Committee, and he thought the general feeling was that a distinction should be drawn if possible. He reminded the House of the concluding words of the Report of the Committee bearing on that subject. They said—

"It must, however, be admitted that the distinction between the two classes is rather dangerous ground, and affords a possible loop-hole for evasion."

Whatever the law might provide, the real difficulty of the position was that described by the hon. Member for St. George's. He agreed with him that there was a great deal more danger in a private undertaking where a memorandum or circular was issued than there was in connection with a concern which was made public and became the subject of public criticism in the press and elsewhere. For his own part, he thought the section was one which would not be found to serve a practical purpose. The danger foreshadowed by the Committee would probably take place. They had a choice between two forms of words, and the ex-Attorney General preferred the wider form of words. For himself, however, the wider form of words, he concluded, was the one which said that the thing should not be done. Although he agreed to a large extent with the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, he thought after all, the attempt at definition should be based on the words of the Bill rather than the words of the Amendment.

MR. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire) said he did not think the evil which would be incurred by widening the words was at all to be compared with the evil of keeping them narrow. What did it matter whether this clause was made applicable to a private company or not? All those who had to do with the evils of joint stock company promotion knew that every year developed a new kind of evil. There was the evil connected with the prospectus, and this Bill seemed a little inadequate to deal with that matter. It was a common practice for a dozen persons to promote a company, to form it, to take shares in it, to enter into a pooling agreement, and to appoint half a dozen brokers. The intention was that such a company should become a public company, though the prospectus did not contemplate this form at all. To such a company as that the provisions of this clause should apply, and he saw no reason to think that any serious injury or inconvenience would be caused to anyone. If they got a simple and plain provision which would cover all such cases, he hoped it would prove more efficacious than provisions with similar benevolent objects had proved in the past.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CARSON, Dublin University) said he did not think the matter under discussion was really of first-rate importance. This clause had been inserted in the Bill at the suggestion of a number of hon. Members on the Committee who desired as far as possible not to interfere with bona fide private companies. Those who spoke on behalf of private companies urged that in these cases the public had no concern, and that it was not necessary to know what the qualifications of the directors were, or whether they had subscribed or not. If the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentlemen were carried it would put an end to the subsection altogether. As the Government were anxious to interfere as little as possible with bona fide private companies, he hoped the House would reject the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE said there were many private companies wholly respectable, but we had to deal with a great many companies that were turned into public companies, and which were frauds from the beginning. An arrangement was made with a large number of brokers who received £1 shares at 10s. or 12s. They had the option of taking them at that price and selling them to the public at £1 or more. It really seemed to him preposterous where they were dealing with public companies that they should make the proposal in the clause. Though it might be annoying to certain gentlemen who wished to turn their business into companies to face this publicity, it was a smaller evil than to allow the public to be swindled in these matters with impunity. It would do very little harm to allow these documents to go before Somerset House; but if the Committee left these quasi-private companies to carry out their arrangements this measure would do no good. We should have a greater number of quasi-private companies, and it was most difficult for the public to know anything of these private companies. There was more swindling in these than in the companies brought out by prospectuses.

MR. WALLACE (Perth) said he objected to the words as they stood in the Bill, and still more to the Amendment which the hon. Member for Walsall proposed to insert. There was no reason whatever why private companies should not come under the section as it stood. There was no hardship inflicted on a private company in requiring that the directors should have their names registered at the time of the formation of the company.

SIR THOMAS LEA (Londonderry, S.) said a very large proportion of the manufacturing trade of this country was done by private limited companies who did not appeal to the public at all. The hon. Member who had just spoken asked why private companies should not come under a section of this sort. Where were they to draw the line? The result would be that private limited companies would come under the whole of the provisions of the Bill, and it would be against the trade of the country and detrimental to the manufacturing and industrial interests.

MR. BRYCE said he hoped the Government would make up its mind to accept the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Walsall. It was not intended that any hardship should be inflicted on private companies by subjecting them to the provisions of Clause 4. It had not been denied that the evils of bringing out these companies without a prospectus were very grave and serious, and under the circumstances he thought the best course would be to omit the words.

MR. BOND (Nottingham, E.): I think the point might be met by a device with which all people who are cognisant of company law are perfectly familiar. The reason private companies object to being brought under the clause is that the object of the clause is to make directors pay for their shares in cash. They might enter into a contract to take these shares or file with the registrar an undertaking that they are willing to take these shares. That would be obviously inconvenient in the case of a private company, because probably the whole of the capital of the company would be divided, if not amongst the directors themselves, amongst the directors and a few other people. The directors have a very large number of shares, and probably, if any qualification is mentioned in the Articles of Association, it is a very large qualification. But they do not get these shares by purchase; they get them as part-proprietors of the

a. The object, I take it, is to prevent gentlemen in that position from saddled with the obligation to buy there being none in the market. Difficulty would be got over if each directors signed the Memorandum for one share only, and if there was made in the Articles the action of a director. That would in any way injure the business, because we are assuming the business to be one, confined to a small number of people, the shares in which are put out before the public for subscription. It is, therefore, the best plan is to stick to the words and put nothing in place.

JAMES JOICEY (Durham, Chester) knew of many companies in the north of England which had prohibitions on the sale of their shares outside the immediate family interested in the business, and he was afraid that many persons did not realise that there were restrictions of companies in regard to which no payment whatever took place. Shares were simply divided amongst the family interested in the concern, and it was unreasonable to expect those people to make all their affairs public. At the same time, the clause was not at all clear. There were words which nobody could really explain, and the only way in which they would be explained would be by litigation, whereas it was the duty of the House, whenever possible, to avoid causes of litigation. Attention had been called to the particular words "issuing any invitation to the public." It was impossible to construe those words, and there were many others of the same character. There had not been a Bill passed for some years likely to give rise to so much litigation as the present Bill. Every clause would have to be construed by the courts. The Government in pressing the measure in its present form were not acting wisely either in their own interests or in the interests of the country. It would really be better, after the discussion which had taken place, that the Government should withdraw the Bill and bring forward another measure dealing with the matter in a much better way.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Mr. Robert Wallace and Mr. Hazell.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE said that Sub-section 6, to which his Amendment referred, was not in the Bill, but on the white paper under his name. As the Bill stood no allotment of any share capital could be made unless certain conditions were complied with. The provision was intended to prevent a company starting with a totally insufficient capital, and to prevent people having shares allotted to them when the capital was entirely insufficient. Suppose a company asked for a capital of £500,000 and they only obtained £400,000 or £450,000, while by throwing over some part of their undertaking they might proceed to carry on business with £450,000. Applicants might have applied for shares on the understanding that £500,000 would be subscribed, but if all of them were willing to take their shares and go on he saw no reason why they should be prohibited from doing so. If they liked to commence business with £450,000, why should they not do so? As the Bill stood they would have to wind up that company and go through the whole process again, and they would be put to great expense. With the object of leaving them free to do what they liked with their own, and proceed with a diminished capital if they thought fit, he proposed later on to move to insert at the end of Clause 6 the following words, which, with the permission of the Speaker, he would read—

“Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall prevent the allotment of shares to any applicant who, after having received notice in writing from the company that the minimum subscription has not been obtained, shall have consented in writing to take allotment of the shares subscribed by him or any less number, and whenever any allotment shall have been so made by consent, notice thereof shall be given forthwith to the registrar, and the total number of shares comprised in such allotments and notice shall be the minimum subscription for the purposes of section eight of this Act.”

There would be very full notice given, and everybody would know exactly what he was doing. He submitted to the Government and to the House that there could be no reason why, because the subscriptions had fallen short, that the whole thing should come to an end, all the expense be thrown away, and the parties sent home without being able to join in the undertaking which they desired to promote. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed—

“In page 3, line 16, after the word ‘allotment,’ to insert the words ‘save as provided by sub-section six of this section.’” — (Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. RITCHIE: I hope the House will not consent to the Amendment of my hon. friend. The House has already given its assent to a proposition that at the formation of these companies the public should be informed as to what is the minimum amount which the directors consider they require to proceed with. Whatever may be the amount of the capital, the directors have to say what, in their opinion, is the smallest amount they can go to allotment upon, which means that they have decided that that amount of capital is required for carrying on the business. My hon. friend desires to drive a coach and four through the provision which has already been assented to by the House, and say that, in the case of this minimum subscription not being reached, the company may proceed to business on a lesser sum than the minimum provided. I do not think we ought to proceed in that way. I think we should not allow this minimum to be set aside simply because the shareholders desire to proceed on a smaller capital than what the directors say is necessary. The hon. Member has argued as if it was a question for shareholders only, but it is nothing of the kind, for it is a question for the creditors as well, and a company proceeding to allotment on a smaller capital is calculated, though not intentionally, to deceive the public. I trust the House will adhere to the clause as it stands.

MR. PERKS: This Amendment shows how delusive this provision is. First of all you are dealing, in the majority of cases, with perfectly capable and solvent companies which would not dream of going to allotment unless they had a sufficient amount of subscribed capital. It is not unfrequently the case that they state in the prospectus that that is the intention of the directors. I think the Board of Trade have been wisely advised in adopting some such provision as this. As I pointed out on Clause 4 in regard to the qualifications of directors, it is capable of being set aside by fixing in the Articles that the qualification should only be one share or a very nominal sum. Therefore, in connection with this supposed protection to the public of a minimum subscription, all that is necessary is for a joint stock company to state that the minimum subscription is to be a mere nominal figure. I know the answer will be that at all events the public will have notice, and I admit that that is a very good answer to a certain point. I wish, however, to point out the danger of grafting upon joint stock company laws a number of harassing and futile conditions, when it is perfectly well known that the cases of fraud which you are trying to protect the public against are only an infinitesimal proportion. There are a number of companies who do not need these harassing restrictions placed upon them, and I think that point ought be well borne in mind by the right hon. Gentleman. There is also another restriction about the amount of money which each shareholder has to pay on application; but there again, it is merely a nominal amount, which will not bring any substantial sum into the coffers of the company for the purpose of protecting the creditors, and this particular clause we are now considering is the passing of a minimum which will be perfectly fair.

SIR ALFRED HICKMAN (Wolverhampton, W.): The explanation is very simple. No man in his senses would subscribe to a company, the minimum subscription of which was placed at a merely nominal figure. We can never protect persons so silly as to do that, but that is no reason why we should not protect others.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT: The evil which this clause strikes at is probably the very worst which has occurred in company administration, namely, proceeding to allotment on insufficient capital. The vendors and others receive their money, and then the company is left without sufficient assets to conduct its business. The clause is required, and I cannot concur with my hon. friend that it might be eluded by stating the nominal amount at which allotment would take place. What would the public think of a company with a nominal capital of £100,000, the directors of which proposed to proceed to allotment on £10? I should like the House, nevertheless, to consider whether my hon. friend the Member for Walsall has not introduced an Amendment which may have an advantageous effect. I admit at once the evil, and I think this clause provides a remedy. What form does the evil take? Why this, that the directors of a company at a meeting of the Board proceed to allotment without consulting the shareholders at all. They act independently of the shareholders, and that is a very great evil indeed. My hon. friend's Amendment provides that the directors shall take the shareholders into their confidence, and if the shareholders deliberately advise the directors to proceed to allotment on the capital subscribed, that is a fair and reasonable corollary to the clause. Suppose it was provided that £100,000 was the minimum, and that the subscription fell short of that amount by only £100, that would be an embarrassing situation, and a great deal of money would be lost, although it might be found quite practicable to deal with the company, with the assent of the shareholders. If a company in such a position had to be dissolved, the stamp duty and all the preliminary expenses would be lost. It may be said that this Amendment opens the door to abuse. I admit there may be cases in which it may be abused, but I think the principle of the Amendment is right—insufficient subscription by a small amount, the practical performance of every object by the company, and the directors acting, not of their own accord, but with the consent of the shareholders. I think it is a very strong proposal.

SIR ROBERT REID said he agreed with the President of the Board of Trade, and also with the observations which had been made with regard to the abuses which had arisen in proceeding to allotment on insufficient capital. He thought this clause would not produce very good results, partly for the reasons which had been already stated, and also because there was nothing to prevent collusive applications. That was a very common form of clause, but he thought a coach and six might be run through it by an ingenious company promoter. He felt that the clause would very likely prove of very small value.

SIR JAMES JOICEY said that if what he would call fraudulent promoters were allowed to go to allotment with a very small capital, they would probably make a market of the shares, as was done in cases where no prospectus was issued. He thought it would be unwise to accept the Amendment. After all, people did not go into a company because of the amount of qualification which the directors held. They went into the company on the character of the directors.

Question put and negatived.

Amendment proposed,

"In Clause 6, page 3, line 17, to leave out 'to public,' and insert 'to the public for.'"—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BOND, in moving the next Amendment, said it was not desirable to multiply formalities beyond what was necessary. He did not understand why the minimum subscription should be inserted both in the Memorandum or Articles of Association and in the prospectus. If the minimum subscription before proceeding to allotment was stated in the prospectus, that was all that was necessary to protect the shareholders. People did not generally propose to take shares in a company unless they had the prospectus before them. The provision of the section was entirely new, and had never hitherto been seen in any Articles of Association.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 3, line 19, to leave out the words 'by the Memorandum or Articles of Association.'"—(Mr. Bond.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. RITCHIE said the question of capital was one of so important and vital a character in connection with the formation of a company that he thought it ought to be entered in something more than the prospectus. That was why it was thought that it ought to be definitely laid down that the minimum subscription which would entitle a company to go to allotment should be named in the Articles of Association as well as the prospectus.

MR. PERKS said the effect of putting it in the Articles of Association would be that it could be altered by special resolution. The effect of putting it in the Memorandum would be that it would be unalterable. The point was this—whether they should now agree that the amount of the minimum subscription should not only be in the Memorandum and Articles of Association as well as in the prospectus—three documents.

MR. RITCHIE: In the prospectus, and one or other of the other two.

MR. PERKS: Then, do I understand that it could only be in the prospectus?

MR. RITCHIE: It must be in the prospectus, and it must be incorporated in one of the other two—either in the Memorandum or the Articles of Association, not in both.

MR. PERKS: Very often in the incorporation of a company in the first instance it was impossible to say what was the amount of the minimum capital it would be wise to go to allotment on. Very often when the Articles of Association and the Memorandum were registered for the purchase of a large number of companies—in many cases in the incorporation of banks, and particularly in the case of the Amalgamation of large industrial concerns—it was almost impossible to say how much it would be wise to fix the minimum subscription at.

Question put, and agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

MR. RITCHIE said the Amendment he now moved was to redeem a pledge he gave to the Grand Committee to amend Clause 6 so as to meet the case of the failure of any bank in which money received from applicants for shares was deposited.

Amendment proposed—

"In Clause 6, page 4, line 4, at end to insert 'from the expiration of the forty-eight days, provided that a director shall not be liable if he proves that the loss of the money was not due to any misconduct or negligence on his part.'"—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR ROBERT REID said he was not a member of the Grand Committee, and was not acquainted with any arrangement come to in regard to this matter. It was a small matter, and therefore it was not worth while saying many words about it. Still he must say that the Amendment did not commend itself to his sense of equity. If directors took from subscribers sums of money which they were pledged to return if the minimum allotment was not subscribed, it seemed to him that they should be under such obligation to restore it that they would be quite certain that it was in custody where it would be absolutely safe. He would not waste the time of the Committee in pressing the matter, for loss in this way was very unlikely to occur often.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. MARKS said there were provisions in Sub-section 6 which it would not be desirable to limit to the first allotment of shares. His object in moving the omission of the sub-section was for the purpose of calling attention to a grave defect in the Bill which was discussed in the Committee upstairs, and in respect of which he at least understood that it was to be dealt with at a later stage. By Sub-section 3 of the clause the amount payable on each share on application was 5 per cent. of the nominal amount of the share. The whole of the section did not apply to the allotment of shares subsequent to the first allotment. If there was a point on which the public and others familiar with joint stock companies had been unanimous since this Bill had been before the public it was that companies should not proceed to allotment with insufficient capital. The stock exchanges, the chambers of commerce, the Institute of Secretaries, the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy were unanimous as to the extreme importance of not permitting companies, as far as the law could prevent them, to go to allotment with insufficient capital. The first condition of allotment on a sufficient capital was that there should be some guarantee that the applications were made in good faith, that they were not bogus applications, that they were not made for the purpose of carrying on stock market deals, and for the purpose of entrapping the unwary. Five per cent. was the smallest possible amount that should be paid on subscription. Small as it was, it was some guarantee of the good faith of the applicant. It created the impression at least that he was not altogether a man of straw. But if it was important in respect of the first allotment of shares that there should be some payment in cash on application, surely it was equally important that on the subsequent allotment of shares there should be some payment in cash. What was the situation created by Sub-section 6? It was this. There was an invitation to the promoter who desired to conduct his business dishonestly—and he assumed that, to a certain extent, this Bill was aimed at dishonest promoters—there was a direct invitation to make the first issue of shares a formal issue. In connection with that issue he had to obey the injunction laid down in the section, but in respect of that first issue only. It might be an issue of 10,000 shares, and it might be worth while to provide 5 per cent. on application, and therefore, so far as the 10,000 shares were concerned, there was a genuine subscription. Having once complied with the law in connection with that purely formal first issue, he was at liberty to ignore all the safeguards contained in that clause. He was at liberty a month or three months after, or at any time, to issue 190,000 shares to the public, and he was not obliged to observe any of the obligations laid down. What was more significant in respect of that subsequent issue was that he was not required to make any amount payable in cash on application. It was infinitely more important that there should be a payment on application in the case of the subsequent issues than in the case of the first issue. He begged to move the omission of the clause.

Another Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 8, to leave out Sub-section 6 of Clause 6."—(Mr. Marks.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out to the word 'for,' in line 9, stand part of the Bill."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said his hon. friend admitted that the greater part of this provision would be quite inapplicable except to the first allotment. With regard to subsequent applications to the public to take shares, a certain protection was given in Clause 6, Sub-section 6, which dealt with the starting of companies. He did not undervalue what his hon. friend had said with regard to subsequent issues to the public, but surely the greater part of the fraud which they had to deal with had been connected with what was termed "proceeding to allotment." He asked his hon. friend not to press his Amendment, but rest content with the fact that they had dealt with the case which was most prevalent.

SIR ROBERT REID: I think the hon. Member has shown by his criticism the weakness of the whole case. Let me give an illustration from the Report of the Board of Trade. A company named Vimbos had a prospectus with most excellent names for directors and solicitors. The sum of £165,000 was offered for subscription, and the public subscribed £535. There was £44,500 underwritten by bogus subscribers. The company went into liquidation, and it was a downright swindle from beginning to end, and this was only one of many of the kind. In this case it was the original application for shares; but as the hon. Member has pointed out, there might have been an original application of a perfectly formal character; and I will undertake to say that this formal application, when this Bill is passed, will become a matter of course, and this swindle might still be perpetrated. What the learned Attorney General has said is quite true, as the hon. Member himself admits—that a considerable part of this clause is not applicable in its terms and forms to anything but the first application for shares; but Sub-section 3 and Sub-section 5 might be left out, and instead of omitting the whole of Sub-section 6 there might be inserted after the word "section" the words "except Sub-sections 3 and 5." That would at least preserve for second applications some of the very small benefits which are conferred by this section. I have nothing more to say in regard to this point; but it is quite clear from the way the clause is drawn that you cannot retain the benefit of the whole of the clause for every application for shares. That is, to my mind, one of the great defects of this Bill, because it does not make any provision for that at all; but by moving the Amendment in the form I suggest it might do some good, and make the exception a little wider.

SIR JAMES JOICEY: This only shows the difficulty which arises in every part of this Bill. Supposing this Amendment is accepted, where are you placing yourself in the case of a company which was incorporated twenty years ago, and finds it necessary to issue more capital? Possibly the minimum amount upon which to go to allotment would have to be stated in the Articles of Association or the Memorandum. If it was stated in the Memorandum it could not be altered. I do not see, if this Amendment were accepted, how you could issue other shares and still comply with the Memorandum fixing the minimum on which you should go to allotment. So far as I know, I think it would alter altogether the working of this clause if the Amendment were accepted. I know a most prosperous company in the north of England which has just issued £750,000. It was incorporated twenty years ago, and if this Bill had been in operation without the section to which the hon. Gentleman opposite objects, then I do not see how they could have complied with the Act at all in their second allotment of shares.

*MR. LAWSON WALTON: I hope the House will adopt the Amendment of my hon. friend the Member for St. George's. Some restriction is sought to be put upon the lodging of bogus capital, but a limit of 5 per cent. upon application money is a very small amount. A concrete case will show what it means. Supposing it is desired by a small syndicate to get a capital of £100,000. It will be necessary to subscribe £5,000, and by providing this sum amongst themselves they may get into their hands the whole of the shares, and by a judicious pooling arrangement and sales on the Stock Exchange they may put the shares on the market at a very large premium. This abuse is inadequately dealt with by the machinery of the Bill. You will have, in every case of speculative and fraudulent companies, two issues. You will have a formal issue and allotment, and you will have an effective issue and allotment. The formal issue will necessarily be a small one, because 5 per cent. of it must be subscribed by the persons who take the shares. Suppose it is said in the prospectus that the company is to have a capital of £500,000 in shares. The first and formal allotment under the machinery of this Act will probably be an allotment of £25,000. In this case the provision of the clause will have been most scrupulously observed. The first issue on allotment having been made, and the company duly registered, the second and effective allotment will then proceed to be made, and the persons who subscribed for the shares with hands entirely free from all the fetters which this Act imposes will proceed to practise the arts of speculative company promoters. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will look upon this Amendment with a little more favour.

MR. RITCHIE: It has been admitted on all hands that the clause as it stands would be inapplicable in many respects to second issues. I think my hon. and learned friend has failed to notice the effect of Sub-section D in Clause 12, which provides—

“The minimum subscription on which the directors may proceed to allotment, and the amount payable on application and allotment on each share; and in the case of a second or subsequent offer of shares, the amount offered for subscription on each previous allotment, and the amount actually allotted; and the amount, if any, paid on such shares.”

Surely that would entirely meet the case which the hon. and learned Member suggests.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.): I hope the Government will give further consideration to the modified form of the Amendment suggested by the hon. and learned Member opposite. The five per cent. payable on application is a very small matter, and I have no doubt that the hon. Member who has moved this Amendment would be quite willing to accept the suggestion which has been made if the Government could see their way to except Sub-sections 3 and 5. I think this small concession would meet the views of the House.

MR. RITCHIE: I will agree to that.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

Mr. Lawson Walton.

*MR. LAWSON WALTON: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to allow some little modification of Sub-clause 2, Section 7. The section runs—

“If any director of a company knowingly contravenes or permits or authorises the contravention of any of the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to allotment he shall be liable to compensate the company and the allottee respectively for any loss, damages, or costs which the company or the allottee may have sustained or incurred thereby.”

So that the liability of the director is to compensate any person who has sustained a loss in consequence of that contravention. Now, the proviso is—

I think I shall be supported by the House if I say so brief a limitation attached to a civil liability is almost unknown to our law. The House will see that the director sought to be affected is one who has knowingly contravened the provisions of the Act. The remedy is not given against a neglectful or indifferent director, but a director who knowingly contravenes the Act of Parliament. Now, I submit to the House that this director is far too leniently treated, because after the expiration of one year from the date of allotment, however flagrant his contravention may be, he escapes scot free. That is far too indulgent to the director who knowingly contravenes the statute. Again, the period within which the remedy is to be enforced is far too short for the person suffering loss. He has only twelve months in which to discover the loss and the breach of duty which caused the loss, and to institute proceedings for the recovery occasioned by the loss. All this is to be done in twelve months. If one looks at the analogous periods in this and other statutes it will be found a very much longer limit is allowed. Under Section 6, Sub-section 4, there is no period fixed; therefore, I take it, the directors may be compelled to repay the allotment money within six years, inasmuch as in similar circumstances, under the Directors Liability Act of 1890, the Court of Appeal recently decided that an action may be brought any time within six years. In both these cases you have to deal with a defendant whose liability arises from carelessness or indifference. In that case a director who causes the prospectus to be issued without having reasonable ground for believing it is true, is liable for six years; but in this case we have a favoured director, who escapes all liability after the expiration of one year from the date of allotment. I fail to see any ground for that exceptional treatment, and, therefore, I say if a limitation is to be allowed at all, that period should not commence until the person complaining has found out that the breach of duty has been committed. If my Amendment is accepted the section will run—

The person complaining then will have to use the utmost diligence, because he has only a year to do it in. These derelictions of duty are never discovered for some time, because those who contravene the Statute always take very good care to cover up their traces.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 24, to leave out the words 'of the allotment,' and insert the words 'at which the default complained of might by reasonable diligence have been discovered by the persons seeking compensation.'"—(Mr. Lawson Walton.)

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I hope the House will not accept this Amendment, for this reason. It is very desirable, so far as we can, to make the period of limitation definite. I am quite aware that in certain cases it is necessary to have the statutory period dependent upon knowledge of the fraud. Still, as a general principle, it is desirable to have a definite time from which the statutory liability is to run, and not to say "from the time when the plaintiff might have reasonably discovered the fraud," which would open the door to a great many things which would not be desirable. There are other objections, if one looks at the section, to the form of this Amendment. In the ordinary course of things these irregularities would be found out at the statutory meeting of the company, if not sooner; but if the period of limitation is considered too short, and if it will be accepted, to save discussion we would consent to its being made two years instead of one.

MR. HALDANE pointed out that the arguments of the Attorney General would have been of great force had they been introducing a period of limitation of liability in the case of the indifference or neglect of a director, but in this case their limitation was directed against directors who "knowingly" contravened the Statute. He was not sure as to these irregularities being discovered at the date of the statutory meeting. Some things would not be discovered until the company had gone some way in its history. This clause was for the purpose of protecting innocent persons against directors who knowingly deceived them, and in limiting the period in this form, the Bill went a good deal further than the courts, which laid down the principle that the period of limitation should run from the date when the fraud was discovered.

MR. RITCHIE thought that the director had some claim to consideration, because all directors were not fraudulent. All contraventions of the Statute were not fraudulent. Nor had sufficient weight been given to the argument that an innocent director might have to undergo pains and penalties extending over an indefinite period if the Amendment was accepted. Although a man who was guilty of fraud deserved no consideration, the man who was charged only with fraud, did deserve consideration. The hon. and learned Gentleman looked at this question from a different standpoint from his. He could understand the ardour with which the hon. and learned Gentleman liked the shooting operation, but the person shot at did not like it, especially if the time during which he might be shot at was an indefinite period. For what might happen? The person who thought he was injured, and might subsequently come with an action against the director, might be content to lie quiet so long as the company was prosperous, but if there came a prospect of winding up, this same gentleman, who was quite prepared to submit to all these intolerable grievances while he was receiving his 5 or 10 per cent. dividend, would come forward and say, "Good gracious, here is a prospect of my getting out of my liability; I will raise an action at once against the directors." There was no reason to make the period an indefinite one, but the Government was prepared to accept the extension to two years, and if that was accepted by hon. Members opposite, a step would have been taken towards settling one of the difficult points of this Bill.

MR. BRYCE said, as hon. Members were anxious to save time, and what was offered by the right hon. Gentleman opposite would be a substantial improvement in the Bill, he hoped the House would accept it.

SIR JAMES JOICEY expressed surprise that the Government should have accepted the extension of the limit of the two years. It appeared to him that anyone reading the clause must come to the conclusion that every director was expected to know the law in every detail, and that he was brought under the penalty of having to refund the capital of the company if he contravened the Act. From his experience, he could say that every board of directors that he was acquainted with had had to have their solicitors at their elbows in order that they might be told when they were contravening the Act or not. When one considered the liability which directors would take upon themselves when this Bill became an Act, he would be greatly surprised if any honest man, unless he was a fool, would submit to come under such provisions as these.

SIR ALFRED HICKMAN, supposing the case of a director dying, asked how his executors would ever be able to wind up his estate if it were to be subject to a liability of this kind for an indefinite period.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs) said that he did not understand the tenderness of the right hon. Gentleman towards a director who knowingly contravened the Statute.

MR. RITCHIE: I said distinctly I had no compassion for a director who did that, but that I had compassion for a director who was shot at who had not done so.

MR. HEDDERWICK said the clause showed undue tenderness towards these persons by limiting the liability to twelve months. There was no such limitation in Clause 6, under which an action at law would lie for six years, and the same principle ought to be applied to this clause. There was no reason for limiting the liability of a director who, in the words of the Bill, "knowingly contravenes or permits or authorises the contravention of any of the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to allotment."

MR. LABOUCHERE said the President of the Board of Trade and those who supported him seemed to have a very curious idea as to what constituted honesty in a director. It was supposed to be something entirely different to that of any other human being, and laws were to be made to allow them to do things which other persons would not be allowed to do, in order to induce them to become directors. The clause said that if a director knowingly contravened the law, or permitted anybody else to do so, he was subject to certain penalties; but if his criminality remained undiscovered for twelve months, he was to be allowed to go scot free. They might as well say that if a director knowingly stole a watch, and the owner did not discover his loss in twelve months, the director should be allowed to go free. He protested against this doctrine of putting a premium on dishonesty, and against the idea that honest men would not become directors unless they were allowed to act dishonestly. He had no desire to treat a director worse than anybody else, but, on the other hand, he had no inclination to treat him better. Possibly a director might have an action brought against him after the expiration of a year, and the individual who brought it might not be able to prove his case; but everyone was liable to that, especially newspaper proprietors, and if this concession was to be made to company directors then newspaper proprietors should be included in it. As to the point raised by the hon. Member opposite as to a director dying, and whether there is any liability upon his executors, he could only say that if a director died he might be let off, because in all probability he would be punished in another world; but so long as he was in this world let him remain liable to be punished if necessity arose.

MR. LAWSON WALTON begged leave to withdraw his Amendment in favour of that of the Attorney General.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment made.

MR. PERKS begged leave to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for North-west Durham. His object in doing so was to call attention to the clause, and to elicit from the Government some explanation with regard to it. The clause seemed to deprive the public of a protection which they had hitherto possessed, and the shareholders of the company of important rights which they had been accustomed to endow themselves with under their Articles of Association. The clause provided certain conditions under which the company might commence business. They had to satisfy the Joint Stock Registrar that they had complied with all the requisite conditions laid down for that purpose. The conditions were that the secretary of the company or one of the directors should make a statutory declaration on two points, and two points only. In the first place, he was to declare—and this was a condition precedent not merely to the commencement of the business, but also to the exercise of any borrowing powers of the company—that the minimum subscription had been provided by the applicants for the shares of the company, and that shares had been allotted to an amount not less in the whole than the minimum subscription. That was the first thing the secretary had to do before the company was launched to the world and commenced business. What was the other condition? It was that the director whose qualification had been specified in the preceding clause must pay to the company on each of the shares taken, or contracted to be taken by him, a proportion equal to the proportion payable on application and allotment on the shares offered for public subscription. Say that the limit on application would be something like 5 per cent., the director would have to subscribe 1s. per share on application and 1s. on allotment. Thereupon the secretary went to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and made a statutory declaration and came out with a certificate—without, he presumed, any note or comment in it—that the company, which might be a perfectly bogus company, was entitled to commence business. But there was another condition in Sub-section 3 which was very extraordinary, and to his mind totally at variance with what was the ordinary course in limited companies. It was the usage that contracts made by a company before they were entitled to commence business were subject to confirmation by the shareholders.

MR. RITCHIE: That has nothing to do with the Amendment moved by the hon. Member, which is for the omission of Sub-section (b).

MR. PERKS said he would put himself in order by moving—as he was entitled to do—the omission of all the words from line 29, page 4, to line 9 on the next page. What he wanted to point out was that this clause was a direct premium given to launching bogus companies on the world with the imprimatur of a Government Department upon them. Directly this certificate was issued by this functionary on these illusory conditions, every contract which had been made before the company commenced business became absolutely binding, and not subject to the confirmation of the shareholders, however absurd or ruinous it might be. He did not think that was according to public policy. He moved the Amendment standing on the Paper.

Another Amendment proposed—

Question proposed, “That paragraph (b) of Sub-section (1) of Clause 8 stand part of the Bill.”

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said when the hon. Member found he could not reconcile the Amendment he originally moved with his speech he moved another, but finally ended by moving the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for North-west Durham, who was present, but did not himself move it. The 8th Clause, which the hon. Member proposed to deal with in this summary fashion, provided very wholesome restrictions on commencing business. A company was not to commence business, or exercise any borrowing powers, until the shares had been allotted to an amount not less in the whole than the minimum subscription, and until every director had paid to the company on each of the shares taken, or contracted to be taken by him, and for which he was liable to pay in cash, a proportion equal to the proportion payable on application and allotment on the shares offered for public subscription, and further until there had been filed with the registrar a statutory declaration by the secretary or one of the directors that the aforesaid conditions had been complied with. And then there was the provision that any contracts made by the company before the date at which it was entitled to commence business should be provisional only, and should not be binding on the company until that date. Surely these were most wholesome provisions, and their effect would not unduly restrict the operations of a company. He really totally failed to see how the hon. Gentleman could contend that the imposition of these wholesome restrictions would promote the formation of bogus companies, and he hoped the Amendment would not be adopted.

SIR ROBERT REID said that by Sub-section 3 contracts made by a company before the date at which it was entitled to commence business would be provisional only, but on that date they were to become binding. Now, the Attorney General was perfectly aware that there were certain classes of contracts entered into antecedent to the formation of the company which were in a suspended state until the directors and shareholders had had full opportunity of considering whether they were right and proper for the company to enter into. Would the Attorney General take steps to insert words to prevent these contracts being made binding by statute on the date the company commenced business?

Sir Robert Finlay.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said the subsection applied only to contracts made by the company, and not by other persons as trustees for the company previous to the formation of the company. Of course, if there was any other objection to the contracts the effect of the subsection would not be to make them binding.

MR. PERKS said that after the satisfactory explanation of the Attorney General he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. H. S. FOSTER moved, "In Clause 8, page 5, line 17, to omit the words 'which has commenced business,' in order to insert 'registered.'" The effect of the Amendment would be to exclude the application of the provisions of the section to companies which had been registered before the passing of the Act. There were many companies which during the last few days had been formed with many millions of capital, and they might proceed to allotment without having stated in their prospectus the minimum amount of subscription.

MR. RITCHIE said he was inclined to accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. MARKS moved to omit Sub-section 7 of Clause 8. The clause itself, he said, contained some very wholesome provisions with reference to the conditions under which a company was to be allowed to commence business. No company was to commence business until it had obtained a certificate from the registrar, and until that event no contract was binding on the company. But by Sub-section 7 this clause was not to apply to a company where there was no intention to ask the public to subscribe for its shares. But if, after registration, and at a later stage, that company issued an invitation to the public to subscribe for its shares, would the section then become operative for the first time; and if so, would the contracts which had been already made absolute cease to be absolute? And must the company cease to carry on business until it had obtained another certificate from the registrar under the provisions of this clause? According to the clause no company could commence business unless it issued a prospectus on the same day that it applied for registration.

"In page 5, line 19, to leave out Sub-section 7."—(Mr. Marks.)

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said that he could not agree with his hon. friend, although he admitted there might be some ambiguity in the sub-section. He did not think that the words, "Where there is no invitation to the public to subscribe for its shares," could be taken in the sense which the hon. Member sought to impute to them. In the case of a private company the clause would not apply; but where shares were put upon the market the restrictions of the clause ought to apply.

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG (Glasgow, St. Rollox) asked whether there was any definition of the phrase, "invitation to the public to subscribe." Unless there was such definition they would never know whether a company had applied to the public for subscriptions. Advertisement was a well-known means of invitation, but would the printing of a prospectus and sending it out marked "private and confidential"—which was quite a common case—be an invitation to the public to subscribe? That would be practically an appeal to the public, although technically it might not.

MR. RITCHIE said that the question had already been answered. Of course the clause did not give an absolute and final definition of what was "an invitation to the public to subscribe." He should say that it meant generally when the public were asked to subscribe for shares. He agreed with the Attorney General that his hon. friend's fears were groundless, but suggested that the following words might meet the objection raised:—"This section shall not apply to any company where the shares of the company are not already offered to the public for subscription."

MR. BILLSON (Halifax) said that the shares might be held by the promoters for a month or two and then offered to the public. He did not think the Attorney General had disposed of the difficulty which the hon. Member had raised.

MR. BRYCE hoped the House would see how serious the difficulty was. The Attorney General was obliged to admit that the construction put upon the clause by the hon. Member for St. George's was a possible construction. The suggested Amendment of the President of the Board of Trade did not carry them much further. Moreover it was an admission that there was considerable uncertainty about the clause. They did not want to give more work to the lawyers. As it was the Bill would give plenty. Therefore he hoped that, in one way or another, the Government would see their way to have the clause redrafted.

MR. RITCHIE said that after the criticisms that had been made he would undertake to confer upon the matter with the Lord Chancellor.

*MR. MARKS said that after the undertaking of his right hon. friend he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. H. S. FOSTER said there was a certain class of companies which would not have to go to the registrar for a certificate to commence business, so long as they could say of themselves that they were a private company. But that private company might find it necessary to make an appeal to the public afterwards, and would the provisions of the clause come into operation then, or would they have a retrospective effect? He trusted his right hon. friend would direct attention to the point so that it could be considered in another place.

SIR JAMES JOICEY quite recognised the importance of having this matter thoroughly reconsidered, as, unless there was some provision of the kind now proposed, the whole clause would be useless. The more he saw of these clauses the more satisfied was he that the Bill was not understood by even its framers.

MR. PERKS asked whether all the existing rights of registration were reserved in the case of private companies.

MR. RITCHIE: That is the intention.

MR. PERKS instanced the case of a company which, registered for private and family purposes with a large amount of capital, was about to make a public issue. When such a company had adopted, or would in future adopt as a private company, the existing procedure, and then later on made a public issue, would it have to go to the Joint Stock Registry for a certificate to enable it to commence business, and comply with the different conditions laid down in this clause?

SIR EDWARD CARSON pointed out that in such a case the company would have already commenced business. The clause would apply only to new companies. A great deal of the difficulty which had been raised by hon. Members would have been disposed of if they had read the section already passed, providing that allotments should not be made until the minimum subscription of capital was forthcoming. The whole question hinged upon that, and the two clauses must be read together.

*MR. TOMLINSON said that the difficulty was occasioned by trying to make one set of words fit two quite distinct states of circumstances. The cases of issues before and after the company had commenced business had better have been dealt with separately.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. H. S. FOSTER moved to insert in Clause 9, line 22, after the word "shares," the words "as the result of a public issue." This clause required a return within a limited period after allotment. Manifestly the allotment was the general allotment of shares; but it frequently happened that a small number were allotted at various times, and there clearly could be no object in enacting that in such cases the return should be made under pain of heavy penalties.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 22, after the word 'shares,' to insert the words 'as the result of a public issue.'"—(Mr. Harry Foster.)

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE pointed out that the issue of shares took place after the allotment, and therefore an allotment, while it might be the result of an invitation to the public, could not possibly be the result of an issue.

*MR. MARKS: I hope the Amendment will not be adopted, as it will take all the value from the provision. It is of the utmost importance that records of allotments, and the other matters set forth in this section, should be open to public inspection, and should be filed more particularly in the case of those companies which do not make public issues. The House will remember that there are other ways of selling shares than by means of public issues, and it is particularly desirable that an eye should be kept on the companies which do not make public issues, but do make allotments.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RITCHIE stated that the series of Amendments standing next in his name were with reference to a clause interpolated in Committee at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen. The Government had consented to the repeal of Section 25 of the Companies Act, which imposed a very onerous fine upon any person holding shares other than shares paid for in cash, and which had not been registered. The result of non-registration in the case of an innocent holder might years afterwards be very serious, and the Government accepted the Amendment with the general consent of the Committee, but these slight Amendments were necessary.

MR. BRYCE agreed with the statements of the right hon. Gentleman as to the proceedings in the Standing Committee. The Amendment to repeal Section 25 of the Companies Act was accepted by the Government, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer made the condition that certain words should be introduced to safeguard the Treasury and provide against the diminution of revenue which might arise. That was understood by the Committee, and therefore there was no objection to these Amendments.

Amendments agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 31, to leave out the word 'number,' and insert the word 'numbers.'"—
(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG said there was more in this Amendment than appeared on the surface. The alteration might be a very serious matter. The "number" of shares would be taken to mean the gross quantity, but to call upon a company to decide what particular numbers should be attached to particular shares was imposing a very serious obligation; and he failed to see what good could possibly be obtained thereby.

MR. RITCHIE remarked that the Amendments he was moving were Treasury Amendments, which he had consented to ask the House to insert, and it would be rather dangerous to depart from the arrangement he had made. He therefore could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES moved the omission of Clause 10. It was difficult to understand why the clause, if it was useful with regard to companies which invited public subscriptions, should not be equally applicable to companies of a private character. He objected to the clause on two grounds. The clause aimed at the prevention of payments of commissions or bonuses to persons for underwriting. The clause enabled that to be done providing there were disclosed on the prospectus the amount and other particulars; but it was totally illegal to do it otherwise. Such a provision would be altogether fatuous in its operation, and would simply multiply the opportunities for fraud. One of the results contemplated was that the purchase-money would be enhanced, that the promoter would receive something more than the real purchase money, and that that "something more" should be given by the promoter to the underwriter. How in the name of common sense did the right hon. Gentleman suppose he was going to follow a transaction of that kind? Unless a punitive law could be made effective it was far better not to attempt to apply such a law. Another objection was that by the clause a considerable amount of mischief would be done to legitimate company enterprise. Underwriting was an exceedingly common form of putting a company on the market, and it was not only a perfectly legitimate process, but a perfectly proper one. When the public knew that astute business men were willing to underwrite shares, it was a certain assurance that the enterprise was of considerable value. This clause would not only stop the fraudulent and improper company-mongers, but it would materially injure perfectly legitimate ventures. The amount paid for underwriting was regulated not by the fraudulent character of the company, but by the character of the enterprise and the risk inherent thereto. He trusted the public would not be given the idea that by a prospectus having to pass through these various methods of Government discipline they were thereby relieved of the necessity of inquiring into the nature of concerns to which they were invited to subscribe. This was a piece of vicious legislation, and it was being forced upon the House at a most improper rate of speed. He ventured respectfully to press upon the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that he should seriously consider the desirability of pressing this clause, which, in the view of a very large number of people interested in public companies, was contrary to the interests not merely of companies, but of the public generally.

"In page 5, line 33, to leave out Clause 10."
(Mr. Atherley-Jones.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Upon any offer of shares' stand part of the Bill."

MR. PHILLIPS (Pembroke) said that if this clause applied to companies already in existence, as he believed it did, it would have the effect practically of enabling companies to issue shares at a discount. Except in the case of railway companies and companies incorporated under special Acts, shares could not be issued at a discount. He instanced the case of a company with £10 shares quoted at £9. Until those shares came up to or above par, it was absolutely impossible for that company to issue more shares. If the clause under discussion became law it would be perfectly easy for a company with £10 shares quoted at £2, providing there was a clause in the Articles authorising it to be done, to issue shares at par and pay £9 per share for having it done. With the shares quoted at £2 it would be perfectly easy to get people to underwrite the shares on such conditions, as they would really be buying £2 shares for £1. The shares could be taken up in big lots, and afterwards sold little by little to the public. The real effect would thus be to issue shares at a discount. He did not say whether or not this was an advantage, but it absolutely changed the whole of the present company law, and the House should not take such a serious step without further consideration.

MR. RITCHIE did not think any clause in the Bill had attracted more public attention than the clause under consideration, nor was there any part of the proceedings connected with company promoting in regard to which more fraudulent practices had been carried out than that of underwriting shares. Although the law at present did not permit any commission to be paid for underwriting, it was notorious that underwriting did take place. Instead, however, of being paid for by the company it was paid for by the promoter, who took care to get his money out of the company. In many cases it was alleged that almost fraudulent companies were started by means of large amounts being paid for underwriting, and subsequently, by means of circulars and otherwise, shares which had been taken at 50 per cent. discount were foisted upon the unwary public at practically their full price. The Committee of the Board of Trade in connection with this Bill carefully considered whether or not the practice of underwriting—which might be perfectly legitimate—should be recognised on proper lines, and it was thought that the best means of dealing with the subject was by legalising that which at present was illegal, with the proviso that everything done in this respect should be fully disclosed. Hon. Gentlemen could not have it both ways. He quite admitted that an underwriting commission of 5 per cent. in some companies might be just as necessary as a commission of 1 per cent. in others. It was quite apparent that no men in their senses would take a large block of shares in a new company at a discount of 5 per cent. if they did not believe it was a good company and likely to do well. So far as he was concerned, he did not think there was the least fear of any company being injured by having to disclose the fact that a certain proportion of the capital had been underwritten; whereas if a company came forward which had been reduced to such straits as to offer to a syndicate or body of persons a discount of 50 per cent. in order to take a certain number of shares, then he thought that the public generally would draw from that the conclusion that the shares of that company were not genuine. Whether it was looked at from the one side or the other, he thought it would be wise for the House to accept this proposal. The transaction provided was a perfectly legitimate one. The disclosure to be made would have no ill effect upon a good company, but it would have an ill effect upon a bad company, and it was bad companies that they desired to strike at.

SIR ROBERT REID said that the great mischief arose because promoters made underwriting contracts of a most scandalous character. If they were prepared to regulate the action of promoters in regard to underwriting contracts he should be very glad to see it done. But what they did in this clause dealt with the company itself, and he wished to point out this fact to the right hon. Gentleman: whereas hitherto the practice of paying money for underwriting had been unlawful for a company, this clause now authorised a company to do that very dangerous thing which up to now they were not allowed to do at all by the law. That was authorised by the sub-section of Section 10. The right hon. Gentleman said they might nullify the effect of that by providing for adequate disclosure, but he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had effected that in his clause, because the proposal was that money might be paid for this wretched business of underwriting. The words were—

“ If the payment of the commission and the amount or rate per cent. of the commission paid or agreed to be paid are respectively authorised by the Articles of Association and disclosed in the prospectus, and the commission paid or agreed to be paid does not exceed the amount or rate so authorised.”

Those hon. Members who were familiar with these matters knew that, in the first instance, there need not be a prospectus, and nothing would then be disclosed. The point he wished to make was that it was much better to have this thing, which was a dangerous thing, unlawful as it was now, because they were doing no good by licensing it and then limiting the licence. It had been said that underwriting was a very good thing, and in some few cases it might be. But everybody knew what actually took place, and he would appeal to their experience upon the subject. The promoter himself was the dangerous person, for he often took all the shares himself for the concern, and afterwards handed them over to the company. He generally made a bargain with the stockbroker, or somebody on the Stock Exchange, by which he placed a very large number of those shares on the market at a particular commission, and the stockbroker used all those methods of working the market, and all the rest of it, which caused the scandals with regard to these transactions. But whether underwriting was right or wrong, the point he wished to make was that it was better to have underwriting unlawful, as at present, rather than to legalise it.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: This clause to which objection has been taken is an exceedingly important one, and I only regret that the audience which heard the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries is not now present.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Dr. TANNER, VOL. LXXXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Cork Co., Mid.). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries objected to this clause, because he thought it was better to leave certain existing customs alone than in any way to legalise them. I take a different view. The law as it stands undoubtedly prevents a company issuing any of its shares at a discount, but the obvious necessities of the case have rendered it necessary to evade that law in a very curious way. The advantages of so doing are so great that a very large number of people who ordinarily would not think of disobeying the law or doing anything wrong consider themselves perfectly justified in committing what may be called an evasion of the law. They proceed as follows: It is absolutely necessary to raise the capital required by a new company. This, as has been found by experience, cannot be done in most cases except by finding people to underwrite, as it is called, the minimum capital required to enable the company to commence business. The company cannot do that directly, and therefore the money required to secure the underwriting is added to the price paid to the vendor. He knows what it is, and the directors know what it is, but the existing shareholders and the subscribing public do not. It may be a large sum or a moderate sum, but the public have no knowledge of it. We have, therefore, an evasion of the law, we have secrecy, we have an unknown amount, and we have an abuse which this clause will remedy. The Government have, to my mind, looked this matter fairly in the face. They have recognised facts as they have found them, and have dealt with them accordingly. The mischief is that companies are not permitted to pay directly for underwriting, or, in other words, to issue shares at a discount, and, therefore, have to have recourse to a roundabout way of securing what they require. The Bill as it is framed does away with the indirectness and secrecy, and provides that except in the manner provided—

“ No company shall apply any of its shares or capital money, either directly or indirectly, in payment of any commission, discount, or allowance to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any shares of the company, or procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any shares in the company, whether the shares or money be so applied by being added to the purchase money of any property acquired by the company or to the contract price of any work to be executed for the company, or the money be paid out of the nominal purchase money or contract price or otherwise."

The Bill removes the illegality of issuing shares at a discount, and renders underwriting lawful under conditions which secure publicity, because the rate per cent. of the commission must be mentioned and the underwriting must be authorised by the Articles of Association, and must be set out in the prospectus. Therefore the investing public will have before them what has taken place. Surely the House will see that that is an infinitely better state of things than the existing law. I do not maintain that it will stop abuses, but it will make them much more difficult, because everyone who subscribes to a company will know what is being done and will know the difference between fair and unfair profit. The underwriter subscribes for a large number of shares, and runs the risk of their being left on his hands, and it is quite fair that he should be paid for that risk. Next I come to the companies already in existence who wish to issue more capital. The first thing is that the Articles of Association will have to be altered, because under existing Articles of Association it would be illegal to issue shares at a discount. The Articles can only be altered by two special meetings of the company, and the alteration must be carried by a majority of three-fourths, and full notice must be given to all concerned; and if there is to be a prospectus issued, the prospectus must give full particulars. I therefore cannot think how, under such circumstances, the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries can prefer the present state of legal evasion to this rational proposal, which secures full publicity.

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG: I hope the Government will adhere to this clause. The only thing which the clause requires is, possibly, that it should be extended so as to include all kinds of companies, and not be limited as it is at present, but that is a matter which will come up for discussion in connection with a later Amendment. I hope the Government will adhere to the clause, so that the whole of the transactions which have taken place in connection with a company should be shown. This is a matter which has practically emerged from the Committee with all parties in agreement regarding it. It has become manifest to everyone that some means must be found to enable the underwriting of the capital of a company to be legitimately undertaken in an above-board and straightforward manner. I do not say that under this clause, or under any clause which can be drawn, you will get a state of things that will be ideal, or to which objection cannot be taken; but that under this clause you will get a state of things infinitely better than the existing state of things is beyond question. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries who spoke against this clause seemed to me to rest his case on exceedingly flimsy grounds. He practically gave his case away when he spoke of "this wretched underwriting business." Why should the principle of underwriting be recognised in connection with all other matters of business in which risk is involved, and not in connection with companies? Why it should be spoken of as a wretched business seems to be inexplicable. To underwrite a vessel at sea, or the immunity of a house from fire or any other risk, is a legitimate piece of business, but it is considered improper and illegal to underwrite the capital of a company offering its shares for public subscription. It might be vital to that company that a certain amount of capital should be secured in advance, and there is no other plan of doing that except by getting certain persons to take this underwriting risk. The law hitherto in this country—though it is not the case in other countries—has nominally prohibited the underwriting of capital; but practically, as my hon. friend has explained, the law has been evaded. Nowadays no prospectus is ever issued to the public without a statement that some contracts have been entered into which may come under the regulations of the Companies Acts as they exist, and acceptance of which is taken as waiving the right to challenge these contracts. What has been the result? The prices have been unduly inflated, and exactly that which the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite said might take place, has been done, but in an infinitely more vicious form than will be possible if this clause becomes law, and transaction of the kind has to be disclosed. I quite agree with my hon. and learned friend opposite, who said that we ought to have further consideration of certain clauses of the Bill, but I think he was entirely wrong in saying that we have not had full opportunity of considering this particular clause. This matter has been before the country in one form and another for four or five years. There is nothing in the direction of the Amendment of the Companies Acts which has been more thoroughly threshed out, and I hope that the Government will adhere to the clause, and thus enable us to get rid of this constant scandal. Under the protection of the clause the public will be able to know exactly what it is they are subscribing for, in the sense that there is no loading or watering of the stock of which they are not aware.

MR. LABOUCHERE said they had been told that at present underwriting was illegal; but whether illegal or not they knew that it took place in numbers of companies, and practically the company paid for the underwriting. The clause recognised underwriting as an existing fact, and declared that it should be permitted provided it was disclosed in the prospectus. One could form a pretty accurate estimate of the character of a company when the amount paid for underwriting was known. If 1, 2, or 3 per cent. was paid, then that company must be worth something; but suppose it ran up to 90 per cent., then they knew that that was a perfectly speculative and gambling transaction. The amount paid for underwriting was, in fact, a natural barometer, showing what a company was in the estimate of business men. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would stand to the clause; in truth, the Bill without it would be a perfect farce. He would ask whether a promoter would have a right to underwrite a company?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: The promoter may do that at his own expense, but he cannot get the cost of the underwriting out of the company.

MR. LABOUCHERE said there was another point on which he desired some light. Sub-section 3 said that "nothing in this section should affect the power of any company to pay such brokerage as it has heretofore been lawful for a company to pay." What did that mean? It meant that they might pay any broker—not necessarily a man on the Stock Exchange—any amount of money to place shares.

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG: There is a limit.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. Gentleman said there was a limit; but the limit had not been fixed. The words were, "Such brokerage as has heretofore been lawful." Brokerage was paid to brokers, and it might be there had hitherto been some limitations. What was underwriting? It was a species of brokerage, but the underwriter guaranteed that a certain number of shares would be taken, and therefore he was the better man than the broker. The underwriter said, "I will guarantee to take so many shares if you pay me 5 per cent." The broker said, "If you pay me 5s. per share I will try and place the shares among my clients." It seemed to him that, if they insisted on the amount paid for underwriting being disclosed, the payments for brokerage should be disclosed also.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said he found himself in entire accordance with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken as to what he stated in regard to the existence of underwriting and the desirability of recognising the fact which could not be prevented—precautions being taken at the same time to prevent an abuse of the practice. These precautions were to secure that the public would know what allowance was being made to the underwriter. As long as that was known he could not help thinking that the more judicious course was that indicated in the clause. His hon. and learned friend seemed to think that they ought not to recognise anything so unholy as underwriting.

SIR ROBERT REID: By a company.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: By a company. But did his hon. and learned friend suppose that it would not go on very much as before? The promoter paid the underwriter a commission, and then he added that to the purchase money which he got out of the public. Surely the more sensible course was to recognise the facts, and to take such precautions as would prevent mischief being done to the public.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked if the Attorney General would be kind enough to say whether the promoter must add the commission paid for underwriting, and the commission paid to the broker.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said that what was proposed to be done was to secure entire publicity, and except under that publicity the company should not directly or indirectly be concerned in payment for underwriting. What the sub-section said was—

"Save as aforesaid no company shall apply any of its shares or capital money either directly or indirectly in payment of any commission, discount, or allowance to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any shares of the company, or procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any shares in the company, whether the shares or money be so applied by being added to the purchase money of any property acquired by the company or to the contract price of any work to be executed for the company, or the money paid out of the nominal purchase money or contract price, or otherwise."

Now, surely if it was possible to forbid a company doing indirectly what they desired to prevent, the words of the clause would have that effect. If the promoter chose to pay commission for underwriting, in future he would have to do it out of his own pocket, because there was an express prohibition to prevent him doing it otherwise.

MR. LABOUCHERE said that the promoter received the money; he did not have to say, "I am going to use it in underwriting," but he said, "It is worth my while to pay 5 or 10 per cent. to have these shares taken up."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said that if the price was a fair price the promoter might pay it out of his own pocket; but if it was not a fair price it was expressly forbidden to be done. Of course there might be evasions in every case. No Act was so broad that it would be impossible that it should be evaded. The hon. Gentleman referred to the subject of brokerage. Brokerage was perfectly distinct from underwriting. An underwriter had to guarantee that the shares would be taken up by the public or that he would take them up himself. In the case of brokerage the broker guaranteed nothing of the kind, and it had been held that it was the law that a company might pay brokerage for having shares placed.

MR. LABOUCHERE: To any amount?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: No; a proper amount.

AN HON. MEMBER: What is a proper amount?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: No actual limit has been fixed, but the amount of brokerage as distinguished from commission for underwriting is very small indeed—an eighth or a quarter per cent. If a broker was found charging beyond those figures it was not really brokerage but commission for underwriting with a guarantee that the shares would be taken up by himself or his friends. What had been done by this clause was to recognise what was at present the law as regarded brokerage. Every lawyer knew that payment of brokerage was at present not illegal—say an eighth or a quarter—for placing shares of a company. According to the section, it was proposed to enact that a company might pay a certain commission for underwriting so long as everything was above board and the public were fully aware of what was being done. Under the circumstances, he hoped the House would not refuse to agree to a clause which promised to have a very beneficial effect.

MR. BRYCE said, as he understood from what they heard in Grand Committee, that brokerage was to some extent elastic, but it was a pretty well established rule that it should not go above a half or three-quarters per cent. If that was agreed to, the result of the clause which the Government proposed to pass was that when any brokerage had been paid by the company it would be for those who endeavoured to justify brokerage to show that it was really brokerage, leaving it to the court to decide whether it was a secret or unlawful form of underwriting and the payment of a secret commission. He could not feel quite satisfied with the answer of the Attorney General to the criticisms of his hon. and learned friend with regard to the position of the promoter. If the promoter knew, to begin with, that it was he rather than the company who had an interest in planting the shares, and ought to undertake the underwriting, he would estimate how much he had to pay for underwriting before selling to the company, and add that to the amount for which he was going to sell. The Attorney General said that that must be a fair price, but who was to say what was a fair price? How was it possible, where the vendor was the promoter, and was selling the business to a company, to estimate within any fair distance of the truth what was a reasonable price to pay? They all knew how excessively vague was the estimate that was put on the worth of a company's business—not only of the tangible assets but of the goodwill. Therefore he said that it would not be possible under this clause to catch the promoter, and he feared they must at present acquiesce in the probability that promoters would continue to pay secret commissions as they had hitherto done. But was it not better if they could compel the company to a full disclosure that they should do so, even if they could not get at the promoter? This matter had been very fully debated by an exceedingly strong Departmental Committee, which included four of Her Majesty's judges, upon whose labours this Bill was founded; and the Committee said that it would be far safer to practically prohibit these underwriting commissions unless they were disclosed, rather than have the secret practice continued.

*MR. MARKS ventured to say that the most pregnant observation made in the course of the debate on this section was that made by the President of the Board of Trade. He pointed out the great advantage it would be to a company which decided to pay a certain amount for underwriting their shares if the rate of underwriting commission were set forth in the prospectus and in the memorandum and articles of association. He was inclined to the view of the right hon. Gentleman that if the underwriting commission was of a reasonable and moderate amount, it would induce the public to come in and take shares. It was within the knowledge of anyone who took an interest in the matter that these underwriting commissions had not hitherto been paid by the company, but by the promoter; and it was absolutely impossible to prevent the promoter from taking the amount of his underwriting risk into consideration when he fixed the price of the property of which he was the vendor. The price was always inclusive of the underwriting commission. But the company might come in and say to the promoter, "According to what you and your friends have told us you are willing to underwrite these shares at a penny," and he would reply, "Oh, yes; my friends say that they are so confident in the success of the company that they will underwrite it at a penny." Thereupon the company would pay the penny, and a prospectus would then be issued, in which it would be set forth that the directors were so happy to state that they had succeeded in underwriting the shares at a penny. Was that a protection to the public? Was it not to open the door to another trap to the public? Again, it was said that the company would have to disclose all the facts; but they could not fix on the company that they knew all that had been done by the underwriter behind their back. There is this one thing to beware of. By this power to underwrite or pay commission for underwriting to an indefinite and unlimited extent you will introduce into your limited company business an evil which has been the greatest evil in this business in the United States of America, the issue of shares at a discount "treasury stock," as it is called, which is one of the greatest evils in the States. A company is required to state in its Memorandum and Articles of Association not the amount going to be paid, but what the company takes power to pay in respect to underwriting. The company issues its prospectus and states that it takes power to issue shares at a discount at 19s. in the £, and they may so issue. Who is to know six months after the statutory meeting has been called, which is the only protection given by this Bill to the general public, that the £1 shares then upon the market were issued at 19s. ? They may be valuable assets in the case of bankruptcy, but they are not valuable assets to the investing public. There ought to be a legitimate power to underwrite, but there should be some limit beyond which the company should not go. The great evil of this clause seems to be that it gives a power to the company to put into its prospectus statements with respect to underwriting which might be a direct incentive to the public to come in and take shares. The promoters will not find fault with this clause, it does not touch them ; nothing in this Bill does touch them in their powers as to underwriting, and in my opinion nothing in any Bill could. That is a fact that it is as well should be known, and it cannot be known too soon.

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) thought there might be something to be said for disclosing in the prospectus every commission paid, but the first to be disclosed should be the commission paid to brokers ; that was far more important than the commission paid to underwriters. The commission paid to brokers, as a rule, would be one-eighth or quarter per cent., but how was anybody to find out until too late what commission had been paid ? The great thing to consider was how the public were most likely to be safeguarded, and he thought that they would best be safeguarded if there was declared in the prospectus the commissions that had been paid to everybody, brokers, solicitors, stockbrokers, etc. Without such a provision, all the solicitor had to do was to put a stamp upon the paper and to send the prospectus to people whom he thought were likely to invest, and nobody would be the wiser and able to find out until too late what had been done. As to underwriting, after a sound company came into existence it might be found necessary to issue debentures or preference shares in order to obtain capital to carry on a legitimate enterprise, and it was necessary to get that money by a certain date. Then, with the sanction of the shareholders, the company went to an underwriter and paid 2½ per cent. to him, and he subscribed in the hope that in a few months he would be able to recoup himself. That was a legitimate transaction, and such a transaction did no harm to the company. If this clause was to be passed he thought every commission that was paid ought to be disclosed.

*MR. LAWSON WALTON agreed with the hon. Member for St. George's that the abuse of underwriting was entirely unaffected by the clause of the Bill as it stood. But he thought that the clause was a step in the right direction, because it made underwriting, instead of being a secret process, a legitimate operation performed in the open light of day. Was it not better to legitimatise such an operation, and to provide that the companies should give full notice of the terms which were paid for the services rendered to it ? The tendency of such legislation would be to put an end to furtive and secret operations, and make them legitimate, and it would also bring the law into harmony with the practice and the views of commercial men upon the question.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney) hoped that the House would not go to a division on the motion to omit the clause. Although the discussion had been most valuable, he did not see that the result desired would be attained by rejecting the clause, and he hoped some way would be found of utilising two or three of the points which had been raised. Everyone was anxious to put down secret underwriting, and he thought that the form of underwriting by the company itself, as was suggested by the clause, was the right way of proceeding. The whole matter was a question of evolution, and that process had gone so far now that company directors themselves were putting into the prospectus statements that no underwriting had been undertaken. But these matters were put in the prospectus merely to catch the unwary, and people were now beginning to look for some legislation of this kind. It was possible that a double set of commissions might be paid, and that that state of things might coincide with the secret and unannounced fact that promoters themselves had been paid a large amount by way of commission for underwriting

Mr. Marks.

Therefore it seemed to him that in order to carry out the policy of the clause as drafted, and to prevent its being used in an illegitimate way, the clause ought to go further as regards disclosure of underwriting contracts, by providing that these should be stated, at all events so far as known to the directors and vendors. This would tend to put underwriting in the hands of the company, where it might very well be. As regards brokerage, too, he suggested that it was desirable to put something more definite into the clause instead of merely a permission to pay such brokerage "as had hitherto been lawful."

MR. RITCHIE said that considerable time had now been spent in discussing the clause, and a good deal of business yet remained to be done, and he therefore hoped that the House would now consider that discussion was practically exhausted, and that they would come to a decision upon it.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said that the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman was, he thought, far from being reasonable. The Bill had been rushed through the Committee, whose Report was not yet in the hands of Members, and this discussion was very valuable.

MR. RITCHIE said he could not agree with the hon. Member, seeing that the Committee sat day after day, and of the discussions which had taken place the House had been kept fully informed.

MR. LOUGH quite agreed that the proceedings of the Committee had been distributed day by day, but was of opinion that a great deal of trouble was necessary to discover what had actually taken place in Committee. He submitted that the House ought to be treated with greater respect, and not be hurried along in a matter of this importance before a proper Report of the Committee had been issued. The arguments urged to recommend this clause were that the clause would have a tendency to restrict the evil practice of underwriting if it were passed, but the object of the clause was to enable companies to pay underwriting commissions out of their capital, and thus legalise underwriting. That was a fundamental change in regard to companies, which ought not to be made in too great a hurry. The Government practically said, "Although we legalise the practice, we will prevent any harm arising by taking precautions"; but then the question arose as to whether those precautions would be sufficient; he did not think they would. After this Bill was passed the company would be empowered to pay large commissions for underwriting out of their capital, and it would be absolutely impossible to find out what capital they had left. He thought that the clause was an attempt to make people honest by Act of Parliament, and he did not think it would succeed.

MR. H. S. FOSTER supported the view that this difficult and complex question was being discussed under most unfortunate circumstances through hon. Members not having the Report of the Committee before them. This question had engaged the attention of a Committee of the House of Lords for five years, and was practically pitchforked into the House of Commons, which was asked to discuss and settle a most difficult problem under exceedingly difficult circumstances. This clause, if passed, would create much greater evils than it sought to remedy. It would give a company power to underwrite or issue their own shares at a discount, a power which at present was very wisely withheld from them. A great deal had been said of the illegality of underwriting, but it was perfectly legal; the only illegality there could be would be in the company being allowed to underwrite. A company was a nonentity until it had gone to allotment, and the underwriting was antecedent to that stage. It was a scheme to call a company into existence and provide the necessary funds, and a certain amount was paid to recoup the underwriter for the necessary risk. Therefore, the company itself could never be asked to underwrite its own shares, for the reason that a company was unable to enter into a contract until after it started business. The remedy which he would suggest was that the President of the Board of Trade should provide in the clause that the underwriting contract entered into between the promoters and the underwriters should be disclosed in the prospectus, and that unless that was so disclosed the contract should be void.

MR. LAWSON WALTON: There is an Amendment further down on the Paper to effect that very object.

MR. H. S. FOSTER said that in that way publicity would be ensured in the most effective way.

MR. PERKS said that underwriting was simply gambling and betting in public companies, involving large sums of public money, and he thought it was better to leave promoters to run the risks they run at present than to give Parliamentary sanction to a practice which in itself was so reprehensible.

MR. BUTCHER (York) said that underwriting was a perfectly fair transaction in itself. An abuse of the process took place when underwriting was done at an exorbitant commission and that fact was concealed from the investing public.

Under proper conditions of disclosure it appeared to him that there could be no objection to underwriting. It had been objected to the clause that there might be two underwriting commissions, one paid by the company, which according to that clause would be disclosed, and one paid by the promoter or vendor, which would not, it was alleged, be disclosed, and that thereby the public would be deceived; but he did not think that would be so, because Sub-section (h) of Clause 12 was drawn up in terms which amounted to a provision that the prospectus issued by a company should set forth on the face of it the amount of underwriting commission, no matter by whom it was paid. It might be that that was not sufficiently clear on the face of it, but he thought the sub-section would provide for cases of this kind, and he supported the clause

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Mr. Atherley-Jones and Mr. Billson.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 38, to leave out the words 'for public,' and insert the words 'to the public for.'"—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'for public' stand part of the Bill."

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG said that the Amendment left matters as regarded private companies exactly where they were. Was it not possible to extend the provisions of the clause to all companies? If the clause was a good one there could be no reason why it should not equally apply to private companies equally as to public companies. To limit whatever privilege the clause conferred to one class of subscribers was a mistake. If the word 'public' were struck out altogether the permissive power would extend to both public and private subscribers.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE suggested that the words of the Amendment would exactly meet the object of the hon. Member.

MR. RITCHIE said it was manifest that where no appeal was made to the public the clause would be inappropriate; its object was the protection of the public. He could not accept the proposal of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. H. S. FOSTER argued that if it was right to clothe a public company with such power as the clause gave to pay a commission to subscribers, it could not be wrong to clothe a company which did not make an appeal to the public with similar power, should that company desire to pay commission to private subscribers.

SIR THOMAS LEA said he had an Amendment dealing with this particular point, and the very close division in the Grand Committee when this point was discussed at length justified raising it in the House. He thought that a private company should at least have the same privilege in this matter as was conceded to a public company.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE contended that it was perfectly reasonable that shareholders should be able to take up shares at a discount, and to raise further capital among themselves. If it was lawful for directors to give this boon to the public, why not to their own shareholders?

MR. LOUGH said that although this was described as a verbal Amendment, it was of a very substantial character. If the Amendment of the President of the Board of Trade was adopted, it would be impossible to make the important alteration suggested by the hon. Member for St. Rollox.

MR. RITCHIE pointed out that he was merely proposing to do in this clause the same as had been done in other clauses where the words "for public subscription" had been used. Instead of "for public subscription" the words "to the public for subscription," were to be inserted. It was purely verbal.

MR. LOUGH could not agree with the view of the right hon. Gentleman. If this alteration were agreed to it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to make the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for St. Rollox. It was evident there was a considerable consensus of opinion in the House of Commons, and a very considerable minority of opinion in the Grand Committee, that whatever benefits this clause conferred on public companies should be conferred on private companies also. The matter certainly required further consideration. There was no definition in the Bill of a "public" company or of a "private" company; the one ran into the other, and practically it was very hard to draw a line between the two. This point ought to be cleared up before the Government asked the House to vote for the Amendment.

MR. BOUSFIELD said that while it was quite true that this matter was raised in the form of a purely drafting Amendment, it came just at a critical point when the House wanted to discuss whether the provisions of the clause should be limited to cases where shares were offered for public subscription, or whether they ought not also to apply to cases where the shares were offered privately for subscription. The best way of settling the matter would be merely to leave out the word "public." With regard to the substance of the question, it seemed to be supposed that there was some distinction in law or in the Bill between public and private companies, and that supposition very much confused the issue before the House. There was no such distinction. Every company was in the eye of the law a public company, even though it was what was commonly called a private company. The question at issue was not whether the clause ought to apply to private as well as public companies, but whether it was to apply to shares offered privately as well as to shares offered publicly for subscription. It was difficult to see why this disability should be maintained in the case of private issues if it was removed in the case of public issues, and it would seem far better, and would greatly simplify matters, if the disability were removed in both cases. Moreover, private issues and public issues so merged the one into the other that it was very difficult in practice to distinguish between the two. Take the case of a company with a large body of shareholders. If that company wanted to issue further shares, and sent out a memorandum to all its shareholders offering these shares for subscription, would the Attorney General consider that to be a public or a private issue? There was no real distinction to be drawn, and the best way would be for the Government to omit the word "public" altogether.

MAJOR JAMESON (Clare, W.) contended there never was an Amendment which opened the way to more litigation than this so-called purely verbal alteration. All the talent on the front bench was unable to define the difference between a public and a private company, and he agreed with the previous speaker that the word "public" had better be omitted.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the words 'to the public for' be there inserted."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"To leave out the words 'to the public.'"—
(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'to the public' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. H. S. FOSTER hoped the Attorney General would respond to the appeal which had been made, and define whether, in a given case, an issue was for public or private subscription. The point under discussion was decided by a very narrow majority in the Committee, and as a supposed concession to the minority this verbal alteration was being made. But it was really no concession whatever, and did not remove the objection of those who desired that the one class of companies should not labour under disabilities from which the other were free.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: The answer to the question which has been raised is very simple. The issue is not offered to the public if it is offered only to a particular class of persons. It does not matter whether the shareholders of the company are many or few; as long as the offer is only to that particular class it is not an offer to the public for subscription.

MR. BOUSFIELD said the reply of the Attorney General did not at all improve matters, and he appealed to the Government to reconsider the question and see whether they could not do away with the distinction altogether.

MR. MARKS pointed out that the reply of the Attorney General simply emphasised the peculiar difficulty which this clause would cause. According to that reply an issue of shares to the 70,000 shareholders in Lipton's would not be a public issue, but an issue to a company with 1,000 shareholders, if only ten outsiders came in, would be a public issue. Absurdity could really go no farther.

MR. PHILIPPS asked the Attorney General to define a "class." If a company which was going to issue shipping shares sent prospectuses marked "private" to the shareholders in another shipping company, would that be an issue to a class? Or if it was proposed to turn a political club in any constituency into a company, and the shares were offered to the members of that club, would that be an issue to a class? Many such instances at once occurred to one's mind, and it was certain that such a provision would lead to endless litigation. The least the Government could do was to define what they meant by a private or public issue, as, if the Bill went out in its present form, countless lawsuits would be the result.

MR. TOMLINSON hoped the Government would see their way to allow this Amendment to be made. If a privilege was to be given to one sort of company, why should it be withheld from another class in regard to which it could do no harm, and might do much good?

MR. BRYCE: I am not quite sure that the effect of this Amendment is generally apprehended. I understand that if we agreed to the Amendment now being made it would be possible for a company not making a public issue to pay underwriting commission. That is the very thing we do not wish a company to have power to do. We say there are certain arguments which may justify the payment of underwriting commissions in cases where there is a public issue, and where all the facts are disclosed in the prospectus, but we think—and this was the view argued out in the Standing Committee—that those arguments do not apply to companies not going to the public for subscription, and that in such cases there ought not to be any provision whatever for underwriting. I therefore hope the Government will adhere to the Bill as it stands.

COLONEL MILWARD (Warwickshire, Stratford-upon-Avon) hoped the Amendment would be adopted. It was quite evident that private companies were placed under disadvantages in this clause. It was impossible in an Act of Parliament to draw any distinction between a public and a private company, and under the circumstances it would be advisable that the Amendment should be accepted.

MAJOR JAMESON supported the Amendment. He absolutely denied that it was ever the intention that private companies should come under the Bill, while the definition given by the Attorney General was the most absurd statement ever made. The Bill was of the utmost importance to the country, and he strongly protested against it being rushed through the House with such unwarrantable speed.

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG thought perhaps the right hon. Gentleman had overlooked the precise wording of the clause itself. The provision was not limited to the case of a man who took a large number of shares and afterwards endeavoured to get other people to buy them, but it extended to the case of a man who agreed, whether absolutely or conditionally, to take shares in a company. The provision would permit a company to make a payment to a man who took shares for his own use and profit, and the House were discussing a privilege which went far beyond the question of underwriting.

MR. PERKS: I notice that the minority of fifteen who voted against the Government in the Standing Committee consisted entirely of gentlemen who usually vote with the Government. I think that is some reason why the Government should not consider unfavourably the proposal to extend the operation of this clause to all companies alike, whether they are called "private" or "public." I quite agree with the hon. and learned Member for North Hackney as to the great difficulty of drawing a line between the two classes of companies; in fact, I believe it is absolutely impossible. At least half a dozen appeals have been made to the Law Officers to define the difference, but we have had no information on the point at all. I wish to call attention to a statement on this particular point made by a counsel well known at the Equity Bar, and one who has probably more experience than any other in connection with joint stock company enterprises—I mean Mr. Palmer. In his letter to The Times a few days ago, dealing specifically with this question—and I think his opinion is worth considering—he says—

"As to Clause 10, this limits the power to pay commission for placing shares to cases in which an offer of shares for public subscription is made. It should be extended to all cases, for there is no reason why a private company should not be at liberty to pay a commission for placing shares, or why it should not be allowable to pay a commission where the shares, as in the case of a reconstruction, are offered not to the public, but only to the shareholders in the reconstructing company. Therefore, the clause should be amended by inserting after the word 'public' the words 'or private,' and by inserting the words 'if any' after the word 'prospectus.'"

That is the opinion not of a mere child, but of a man who has had probably more experience than any counsel at the Equity Bar on this matter, and I venture to commend it to the attention of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Faithfull Begg.

MR. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead) said it really did not very much matter whether the word "public" was omitted or not, as anybody with the smallest ingenuity could get round the provision. All a private company would have to do would be to print enough circulars and prospectuses to go round to all its shareholders, and one hundred additional, which could be scattered broadcast about the streets or anywhere. The issue would then become a public issue, and be within the provisions of the clause. The whole thing was not worth fighting about, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment.

MR. LAWSON WALTON contended that no reason whatever had been shown why a private company should be allowed to pay underwriting commission on the placing of shares which were not issued to the public. In other words, it was argued that a private company should be allowed to pay underwriting commission for issuing shares to its own shareholders. He could understand a commission being paid for outside assistance in inducing members of the public to subscribe, as in that case the consideration for the payment was the service thus rendered. If a company was not going to make a public issue why should they be allowed to use these agents? The whole of the limitations were placed not upon shares held by the public, but upon those held by persons who were not members of the public. He thought it was clear that an issue to the public was an issue to any member of the public who came forward and took shares in the ordinary way. Why should they give power to a company to detract from the nominal value of the capital by the employment of brokers, who ought not to be required? He hoped the Government would not yield to the pressure which was being put upon them from all quarters of the House.

MR. BOND pointed out that the effect of the clause was simply to enable companies to issue shares at a discount. Why should a company be allowed to issue its shares at a discount?

MR. LOUGH said he only wished to answer one question. The hon. Member who had just sat down asked, why should a company be allowed to offer shares to its own shareholders at a discount? At such times as those shares were offered there might be some very good reason. It might be difficult to get money, and it might be advisable to take advantage of some bargain that had been offered to the company. In such circumstances the company would be offering to all its shareholders some advantage. He wished to ask his hon. and learned friend why should it be an unlawful proceeding with these particular companies, while it might be quite lawful in the case of some other companies? He hoped the House would take a common-sense view of this question.

Question put.

MR. HENDERSON (Staffordshire, W.) said that the effect of the Amendment he had to move was to treat all underwriters in the same way. It was a fact that today a colonial or a foreign issue might be dealt with in this way without disclosing the fact. Why should they make a distinction between a colonial or a foreign company and the interests of an English company? Suppose a company already in existence determined upon making a new issue for the purpose of purchasing some additional property. That property might be purchasable to-day, but before the company could get its money to effect the purchase it had to call its shareholders together, which would take from seven to fourteen days. The company would have to hold a confirmatory meeting, and at least a month would lapse between the time the company was in a position to obtain the money by publication. That company might go to the underwriters who would for a small commission agree to underwrite the transaction, and then the company could proceed at once to make its bargain. Therefore it was essential that this underwriting should be done, and where the commission was a small one he did not see why the issue should be prejudiced by disclosure. That it would be prejudiced was clearly proved by the fact that it is not uncommon to find it stated in prospectuses as an inducement to the public to subscribe that no part of the capital has been underwritten. Therefore the effect of disclosing that the capital had been underwritten must be detrimental. Where a large commission of a very excessive character was paid it should be disclosed, for that would do away with a good deal of fraud and dishonesty, but where the sum paid did not exceed two and a-half per cent. he did not think it was necessary to disclose it. He thought the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill might very well accept the words of his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6, line 4, after the first word 'and,' to insert the words 'in case the said commission, with brokerage, exceeds two and a half per cent. are.'"—(Mr. Henderson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE: I can assure my hon. friend that if I could possibly see my way I should be only too glad to accept his proposal. I will briefly state the reasons why I think it would be unwise for the Committee to accept this Amendment. The effect of it would be to create two classes of underwriters, one class disclosed and the other class not disclosed. You would thus divide companies into two categories, and the effect might very well be to leave an impression on the public mind that those companies which did not disclose were really of a superior kind to those companies which did disclose—which paid a brokerage of over 2½ per cent., and consequently were obliged to disclose. I think that would give an erroneous impression, because it might be just as reasonable to pay 4 or 5 per cent. in one case as to pay 2½ per cent. in another. It is clear that there is in some cases a greater element of risk, but that does not imply that one company is necessarily a better company than the other because it has been underwritten at a smaller rate. There is no slur attached to any company which pays a commission of 5 per cent. It is quite clear that the drawing of this distinction between companies paying 2½ per cent. and not disclosing and companies paying 5 per cent. and disclosing would involve an invidious comparison between the two companies. That is the reason why I think it would be unwise to accept the Amendment of my hon. friend, and I hope he will not press it.

MR. CAWLEY (Lancashire, Preston): I really cannot see that the right hon. Gentleman has given any argument against this proposal at all. If the public discriminate by the fact that only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is paid, then they are very much the gainers, because anybody who knows anything about company promoting knows that no large financial firm would take over the responsibility of a large issue at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. unless it was a good company which would commend itself to the public generally. I think the right hon. Gentleman's argument in regard to discriminating between $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and a larger commission tells in favour of the Amendment. In several cases it may be imperative for certain companies to have money at a certain time, and if they are to go to a large issuing office and tell them that they want the money immediately, and that the underwriting will have to be disclosed, that prejudices them before the public, and they have to pay a larger amount for underwriting. Therefore, I think the Amendment ought to recommend itself to the House, and I shall be extremely glad to support it. Underwriting is an assurance that the issue will go on, and as far as I know it is a very legitimate thing to have an insurance for a large issue.

MR. PHILIPPS: I hope the Government will see their way to accept the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for West Staffordshire, who is an authority upon this class of business. From such experience as I have had, I am convinced that the hon. Gentleman is right when he says that with high class established companies the fact that they should be compelled to disclose when a commission larger than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was paid would be detrimental to the success of those high class companies and would act as a check to a class of business which we ought to encourage rather than discourage. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill said, if we accepted this Amendment it would lead to two classes of underwriting, and that you would have disclosed and undisclosed underwriting. I do not know whether the Attorney General fondly imagines that by this clause he is going to limit the question to disclosed and undisclosed underwriting. I am convinced that if this clause becomes law as it stands, it is going to open the door to more swindles than the Bill itself is going to stop. It has to be remembered that in dealing with company promoters you are dealing with one of the cleverest and one of the most unscrupulous classes in the country. The right hon. Gentleman said some little time ago that it would be a most excellent thing for a company to be able to say in its prospectus that it had paid five per cent. for issuing its capital. Supposing a manufacturing concern is issued to the public in £1 shares, and the directors say in perfect good faith in the prospectus that they have underwritten the £1 shares to the extent of 3d. a share. In that case it would have a very good effect on the public, and would induce them to subscribe. What is going to prevent the promoter of a shady company from letting the directors pay one and a quarter per cent. while he pays the rest himself?

MR. LOUGH said he thought that the Amendment was a very moderate one, and that the House did not realise the careful limit which was embodied in it. Any hon. Member who had listened to the speeches must have felt that if the Amendment were not accepted a certain class of very good business would be put a stop to. Supposing that half a million of money were required, a prospectus could not be got out in an hour or a day, but the money could be obtained in a few hours by paying brokerage. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill seemed to think that a statement in the prospectus that brokerage had been paid would prejudice the issue; but people would say when they read that statement that they would also take shares if they got $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. brokerage, but they could not then get it, because it had been paid for getting the money perhaps months before. That was the worst of such skilfully drawn clauses. They often interfered with business that was not fraudulent or undesirable, and he thought the House should consider well before rejecting the Amendment.

MR. BOUSFIELD said that the arguments which had been used in favour of the Amendment were in his opinion rather against it. It was urged that if 2½ per cent. brokerage had been paid, and if that fact were published in the prospectus, it would prejudice the success of the issue. It seemed to him that if such a statement of fact did prejudice the issue it ought to be disclosed to the public. According to the hypothesis of the hon. Members who supported the Amendment, if he read the prospectus without knowing that the shares had been underwritten, he might subscribe, but if he did know he would not subscribe. The clause only made certain things legal which were hitherto illegal, and it was quite right to impose on a company the obligation of stating in its prospectus that a commission had been paid.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Sir William Walrond and
Mr. Anstruther.

MR. LAWSON WALTON: The Amendment which I now move provides that "where no prospectus is issued a memorandum complying with the terms of this section shall be filed." The House will have observed that the machinery of this Bill provides that the prospectus of a company should contain certain particulars, and that the discipline which is exercised by the Bill, is exercised largely by means of the prospectus. It is necessary that the prospectus shall contain the names of the vendors, the amount of the purchase-money and various other particulars, and after the prospectus has been issued to the public, there is a provision that it must be filed. There are, therefore, two steps to be taken for the public protection. One is the issue of prospectus containing certain information, and the second is the filing of the prospectus, giving the documentary history of the company, and the first steps which were taken with reference to it. The result is that two classes of the community receive valuable assistance—one, the persons who are appealed to to subscribe for shares, and the other, the persons who might be invited to give credit to the company. There is a door, however, in the provision which I hope to close. There is a large number of companies that issue no prospectuses, because it is inconvenient, and the promoters may be able to place the capital by some other means. The syndicate which forms the company manages by means of personal recommendation to place its original capital, and having placed its original capital, it is then enabled to create a market for the shares, and the mere transactions on the market and the quotations of the shares advertise the company, and the public are drawn in without knowing anything about it except that the shares are being dealt in and are likely to go to a premium. That is the state of things under the existing law, and it will be enormously increased by the present Bill, which imposes such stringent restrictions on the issue of prospectuses. If under the existing law there are a number of companies which issue no prospectuses, how many more will not come before the public without the instrumentality of a prospectus when under this Bill various stringent requirements must be complied with by all persons issuing documents of that kind. Therefore I propose to check the abuse by enabling any shareholder or creditor to find out the history, main features, and formation of such companies. A company is registered, its shares are placed, but without this Amendment there will be no record filed of the original shareholders or directors, or the subscribed capital, or any of the particulars that are required to be given in a prospectus. What I propose is that where a company issues no prospectus, a memorandum compiled under the requirements of this section shall be placed upon record, and shall be accessible to every shareholder who may have bought shares in the company, and to every person who may, perhaps, have given credit to the company. We have what has been described already as one man companies. The one man company is a private concern; it does not issue its capital to the public, and all the shares are held by one man and by one or two other persons under his control. There is a case of a one-man company which will be found in the House of Lords Reports for 1897. It is the case of Solomon v. Solomon and Co. The company had a capital of 30,007 shares, of which 30,000 were held by Mr. Solomon and the remaining seven by seven of his nominees. Not only did Mr. Solomon hold all the share capital, but he also held £20,000 of debentures, and he controlled the company with respect to all its transactions and in relation to the whole of its profits. Under this Bill, unless my Amendment is adopted, such a condition of things will not be recorded, and a company not issuing a prospectus will not come within the operation of this section. The transactions will be carried out in complete secrecy, and at a subsequent date, after the shares have been placed on the market, a shareholder may say, "I want to know something about this company. Had it ever a prospectus?" and the answer will be, "I do not know." Then the shareholder may ask, "Under what circumstances was it issued?" and the answer will be, "No one can tell." There is no memorandum available either for the information of subsequent investors or, what may be more important to the community, to enable traders to ascertain whether they are dealing with a company which is responsible for its debts. It is said that this Amendment will press hardly on honest private companies. Assuming that a private company places its capital without issuing a prospectus, I ask the House to consider whether, with perhaps one exception, any of the requirements of this section are such as any honest company could object to. For instance, no honest company would object to stating the names of its shareholders, how many shares had been allotted, and other similar information. But even if there is some secrecy in regard to these matters, is it not reasonable that these companies, for the very great advantage they obtain in the way of limiting their liability, should conform to some standard of publicity as regards their origin? If a private concern seeks to have the immense advantage of limiting its liability, should it not give to the public some information with regard to its formation, and enable traders to judge whether or not a concern to which they are invited to give credit is or is not responsible? I hope the House will not lightly dismiss this Amendment. I am quite sure that many Members regard it as vital to the Bill, and I feel satisfied that unless you distinctly intimate to future company promoters that this information must be given either by means of a memorandum or in a prospectus you will leave the investor in the future quite as much in the dark as to a company's origin as he is at present, and will give the creditor no means of obtaining the information to which he is entitled, and which he will obtain if this Amendment is adopted.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6, line 33, after the word 'filed,' to insert as a new sub-section the words '(4) Where no prospectus is issued a memorandum

complying with the terms of this section shall be filed in manner aforesaid."—(Mr. Lawson Walton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I would point out to the House that we would be occasioning very considerable hardship if we were to impose all the requirements of Section 12 on a very large and respectable class of companies which are solely private companies. They would resent being required to give these particulars. My hon. and learned friend says that if we do not require such a statement as he suggests we leave the door open to very great abuse. We have endeavoured to provide by Section 12 for the protection of the public whenever a prospectus is issued, and when the public are invited to subscribe for shares. The argument of my hon. and learned friend is that companies will endeavour to avoid the requirements of Section 12 by having no prospectus at all, that all the shares will be allotted to the promoter or an agent of his, and that then the promoter will sell the shares on the Stock Exchange, and that by that means a market will be created for them. The trick against which my hon. and learned friend wishes to guard is not a very common one, although it has come before the courts on certain occasions. If my hon. and learned friend apprehends that shoddy companies will avoid the issue of prospectuses in order that their shares may be put upon the market by the promoters, the Amendment will not meet the case. The public will look askance at any undertaking launched in that way, and I would ask the House not to accept the proposal, which would put upon perfectly respectable people a burden they would very much resent, in order to prevent a possible evil, the extent of which I think has been very greatly exaggerated. I think the House will agree with me that the evil is one which will tend to cure itself, because if a shady company appears without a prospectus the public will avoid it, and for these reasons I trust the House will not accept the Amendment.

*MR. MARKS said that the view of the public with regard to companies which did not issue prospectuses was not quite the same as the Attorney General seemed to imagine. On the contrary, the company which issued a prospectus did not stand in such great favour with the speculating public as the company which did not. There was a certain charm about mystery, and the public were induced by this, that, and the other rumour to rush in and buy certain shares, so that when the inevitable collapse came it was impossible to bring home the responsibility to the authors of the scheme. He therefore considered the suggestion embodied in the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for South Leeds to be an admirable one in itself, and one which was vital to the perfection of the scheme before the House. The public which required protection was not the public assailed with prospectuses. A prospectus could be laid before experienced people; contracts might be inspected, and inquiries made; but when no prospectus whatever was issued the public were at the mercy of the hidden promoter, and that was the class of company in regard to which people required to be protected. But the Bill before the House gave no protection whatever in that direction. They were told that if any attempt was made to deal with this obvious evil, they would be unduly oppressing purely private companies. What was a purely private company? There were many companies founded to take over the businesses of well-established firms, and the bulk of the shares were distributed amongst the partners in the firm, very few reaching the customers and the general public. So long as the business was profitable the company continued to be a private company, but as soon as the profits commenced to decline the company began gradually to become a public company. One might sometimes test the good faith of the so-called private company by the announcement made in the prospectus that a quotation and settlement would be applied for on the Stock Exchange. If the public were to be protected from this class of scheme, there must be something in the nature of a memorandum filed at the time of the registration of the company. That memorandum need not be of an exhaustive character or reveal any sacred secrets of a private business. It might merely set forth the name of the person who sold the business, the date of the sale, the price paid, how much of that price was in cash and how much in shares, and the class and numbers of the shares devoted to the purchase-money. The public, if they bought those shares in the market in the future, would then be able to ascertain whether they were buying vendor's shares or not. A few such precautions, without acting detrimentally to genuine private companies, would serve to protect the public. The class of company which had fluctuated in recent years more than any other was the mining class. He believed he was correct in saying that not a single prospectus was issued in connection with any of the Barnato group, and there never was a set of companies which at one time had stood so high and afterwards come so low. He certainly hoped that some such Amendment as that before the House would be incorporated in the Bill. Such an Amendment would remove a very serious flaw in what might otherwise be an useful measure.

MAJOR JAMESON characterised the Amendment as absolute nonsense. By it the House would be legislating for one-man companies, and there was already quite enough such legislation. It seemed to be argued that private companies should have none of the privileges but all the disabilities of public companies, and he trusted the House would vote with the Government against this Amendment.

*MR. BAINBRIDGE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough) apprehended that the intention of the Bill was to protect the ordinary speculator and investor, and he could not conceive the use of the House wasting its time in trying to protect the careless gambler. Nobody who bought shares in a Barnato company deserved to be protected by a Bill passed through the House. Such a man could not claim to have been misled; he simply saw shares rising in the market, and, without any information, made up his mind to speculate in them. The House would not be justified in spending time in protecting people of that class.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Sir William Walrond and
 Mr. Anstruther.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I rise now [12.15] to move the adjournment of the debate. I think that the Government have done a very good day's work indeed. Many of us have been here since noon.

*MR. SPEAKER: When the House has agreed to suspend the Twelve o'clock Rule it is not the custom for the Chair to accept a motion of this kind so soon after midnight.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: We have to meet again to-morrow at twelve o'clock, and in those circumstances I think the Government might consent to an adjournment. Eleven clauses have now been passed, and the twelfth clause is one which requires very careful consideration. The Standing Committee only reported upon this Bill on Thursday, and we actually did not get the Bill in type until yesterday morning, and we have only had one day to look into the matter. In these circumstances I think the Government might be content with their success in getting eleven clauses passed, and I hope the Government will accept this motion.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): On a point of order. Is this a Coercion Act?

*MR. SPEAKER: I have the power, under the Standing Order, either to refuse this motion, or to put it to the House forthwith. I will give the House an opportunity of saying whether they approve it or not, and I will put it to the House forthwith.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Do you desire, Mr. Speaker, that I should say a word, or do you wish to put the question at once?

*MR. SPEAKER: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept the motion?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Sir William Walrond and
Mr. Anstruther.

MR. H. S. FOSTER moved to omit from Clause 12 the provision that every prospectus must contain the names, description, and addresses of the signatories to the Memorandum of Association and the number of shares subscribed for by them respectively. The prospectus already had to contain a vast number of clauses giving general information. As a matter of fact, the Memorandum was so extensive that it had to be printed in very small type, and it was doubtful whether one person in 10,000 ever read it. It was therefore absurd to require to be added to that the information here provided for, which was perfectly unnecessary, of no value, and would minimise the value of the other information for which the clause provided.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6, line 37, to leave out the words from the word 'association,' to the word 'the,' in line 39."—(Mr. H. S. Foster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. RITCHIE was of opinion that this information ought to be given to the public in a prospectus.

MR. BRODIE HOARE: Why should it be given?

MR. RITCHIE: For information.

MR. BOUSFIELD did not think anybody would pay the slightest attention to the persons who signed the Memorandum, as they were usually solicitors' clerks, and there was really no importance attached to it. This certainly was a very trivial matter.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE said there was a very good reason for not burdening a prospectus with valueless information. The more stuff was put in the less likely were people to read it. What was desired was that the pith of the matter should be given. If he desired to take people in he should put into the prospectus every possible bit of nonsense, because then the people would tire of reading it.

*MR. BAINBRIDGE thought nothing existed in a prospectus more weighty than the names therein given, and certainly it would take away from their value if the prospectus were crowded with names which were absolutely unimportant.

MAJOR JAMESON cordially agreed with the Amendment. If everything the right hon. Gentleman desired was inserted the prospectus would extend to greater length than the New Testament, and to put in line after line which would not have the slightest meaning to the persons concerned was most absurd. The only persons who would benefit by such information being given were newspaper proprietors, who received 1s. 6d. per line for advertising the prospectuses, but surely that was not the desire of the President of the Board of Trade. So far from people being kept out of difficulty by having line after line of this rignmarole put in, they would be plunged in deeper and deeper, and not the slightest good would result. The House should, as business men, support the Amendment.

MR. LOWE (Birmingham, Edgbaston) joined in the appeal that the Amendment should be accepted. His experience was that the signatories of the Memorandum were not looked upon as at all material; whether a person took five or 500 shares, he usually signed simply for one share, and this information would not be of the slightest value.

MR. BILLSON (Halifax) said the reason the Memorandum was usually signed by obscure persons was that it was merely a matter of convenience, but if this provision was made pains would be taken in future that persons having a real interest in the concern should sign. As to benefiting newspaper proprietors, the clause did not require that the names should be advertised, but merely that the prospectus should contain them. Usually an abridged prospectus was advertised, so there was no force in that objection.

MR. LOUGH believed the advertisement of an abridged prospectus was always looked upon with suspicion. The argument that substantial signatories would be obtained simply because they would be published was purely conjectural. Not a single word had been said in favour of the clause, and he thought the Government, in deference to their many supporters who had spoken against this clause, should give some further reason for resisting this Amendment. If the Solicitor General could give some legal reason of any kind for this extraordinary proposal it might not be necessary to go to a division.

MR. T. M. HEALY said this Amendment raised a very important question, which was emphasised by the statement of the hon. Member in regard to abridged prospectuses. If the hon. Member would refer to the definition of prospectus in Clause 34 he would find the following explanation—

“The expression ‘prospectus’ means any prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares or debentures of a company.”

Any advertisement issued must contain all the matter provided for in that clause.

Amendment proposed—

“In page 7, line 34, after the word ‘specifying,’ to insert the words ‘if possible.’”—(Mr. H. S. Foster.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘if possible’ be there inserted.”

MR. RITCHIE: It is clear that if no amount has been paid for goodwill it will not be put in, but if any amount has been paid for goodwill then it should be put in.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. BOUSFIELD proposed an Amendment in line 35. Two or three times they had had the case put which arose under Clause 10 of underwriting a company at a small rate of commission mentioned in the prospectus, while there might be behind that an underwriter at a large commission. The President of the Board of Trade had rightly stated the importance which might be attached by the public to statements of that sort. That state of things was quite misleading, because there might be an undisclosed underwriting by a promoter at a large commission. It was urged that if there was any money paid by a promoter for underwriting it would have to be disclosed in the prospectus. There was great doubt whether that reading was correct. The clause dealt with commission paid by the company, and he rather gathered from the silence of the Government on the point that the provision did not deal with the case of underwriting paid by the promoter. The opinion of the House, as shown in the discussion, was certainly that the prospectus should contain a statement of all underwriting, and if that was also the intention of the Government it ought to be made clear. He therefore moved to insert after the word "paid" the words "by any person."

Amendment proposed---

"In page 7, line 35, after the word 'paid,' to insert the words 'by any person.'"—(Mr. Bousfield.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE: These words would not, I think, in any way alter the meaning of the clause, but if my hon. and learned friend desires to have it explicitly stated I have no objection.

MR. BAINBRIDGE said the amount of commission paid might not be known to the person issuing the prospectus, and therefore by passing this Amendment the House might be asking for particulars of which the person issuing the prospectus had no knowledge whatever.

MR. RITCHIE suggested that the Amendment should be withdrawn. He would undertake that the point should be considered, and if necessary a provision inserted in another place.

MR. H. S. FOSTER pointed out that underwriting might be, and usually was, done after the prospectus had been settled and passed by the directors. In such a case it would manifestly be impossible for the directors to specify the amount of underwriting commission.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE said that when the question of underwriting was being discussed Members were told it did not matter what the promoter might do, because the money would not come out of the pocket of the company. The promoter avowedly added a certain amount of money to the fair price of the property he was selling, because he undertook all the preliminary expenses, including underwriting. But now the company was empowered to underwrite it would be very improper for any such addition to be made to the amount paid to the vendor in that respect, and therefore the directors would always have to show that only the fair value was being given for the property or contract purchased. If the principle was introduced that the vendor also might pay for underwriting the House would be legalising a practice which was much better not legalised, and taking away the one safeguard the public had that only a fair price was being paid.

MR. RITCHIE thought the observations of the last speaker were very much to the point, and he would take care that nothing was done which would in any way affect the point he had raised.

MR. LAWSON WALTON said their present position showed the extreme difficulty of discussing a highly complicated measure in the early hours of the morning; it was almost impossible to understand the meaning of some of these Amendments, and Amendments to Amendments. He failed to see how it was possible to ensure payments by the promoter being put in the prospectus.

MR. RITCHIE explained that all he had promised was that the point should be considered.

MAJOR JAMESON objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment. The present confusion was the direct result of the attempt to run the Bill through the House at such an hour. First the right hon. Gentleman agreed to accept the Amendment, and then he said he would not. The only result of a great many of the Amendments which had been made would be to give business to the lawyers, and he could therefore understand learned Members being in favour of them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

RESERVE FORCES BILL [Lords].

As amended, considered.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid):
I wish to call attention to Sub-section (b)

of Clause 2, and to ask your opinion, Mr. Speaker, whether it is in order, or whether it is not necessary that the matter should be first dealt with by a resolution of this House. I submit that this section involves a charge on the Imperial Exchequer, and, before it can be incorporated in the Bill, there ought to be a preliminary resolution. It provides that under certain circumstances the pay of a soldier shall either be increased or reduced. It is quite true that there is the alternative of reduction, but I think it may be assumed that the probability is that there will be an increase of pay, inasmuch as men of good character going into active service, and thereby entitling themselves to an increase of pay, are likely to be far more numerous than men whose pay will be reduced through punishment. Experience has taught us that that is the case, and, therefore, as the Bill involves a charge upon the Imperial Exchequer, I submit there ought to have been a preliminary resolution before this particular proposal is embodied in a Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Bill cannot be regarded as creating a new charge, because the possible expense ultimately involved must be included in the ordinary Estimates of the year, and will, therefore, receive the sanction of the House in due course. It is really only a statement that the pay of the soldier should be at a certain rate, and therefore it is not a matter needing a resolution, as the hon. Member suggests.

MR. CALDWELL: Then I beg to move an Amendment providing that the Bill shall not apply to men in the second division of the first class of the Army Reserve who entered the division before "the passing of this Act," instead of before the first day of June, 1900. I believe the Government are willing to accept this Amendment.

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £32,250, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, including a Grant in aid of certain Expenses connected with Emigration."

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): About six months have elapsed since we were presented with a Blue-book in regard to South Africa. We now have had two given to us. As regards the first I do not find that it contains much information of any value, although it is a volume of considerable size. It relates to the correspondence between Lord Salisbury and President Kruger which has already been published, and for the remainder it is mainly composed of extracts from newspaper articles and of tittle-tattle. It does not put the House in possession of any information at all as to what is really going on in South Africa. The second Blue-book, I am bound to say, is of a different character. It deals with the constitutional question raised between the Home Government and the Cape Government with regard to the treatment of the rebels and as to the policy of the future. But even there the information is of a somewhat meagre description, and we have to judge very h by inference as to what has actually rred between the Home and the Cape ernments. As to the constitutional tion, so far as it is disclosed in the -book, I have no criticism to make. eems to me that the treatment of ls is a question both of Imperial Colonial interest. Besides, appa- ly the Cape Government did invite right hon. Gentleman the Colonial etary to express his view on the tion of the rebels and their punish- t, and he was therefore fully entitled ve it. But it appears incidentally ne memorandum, and a like infer-may be drawn from other memo- a that there has been something nd what appears in the Blue-book— thing behind the correspondence ed on on constitutional lines. Cer- members of the Cape Cabinet appear ve entertained the idea that, unless adopted the right hon. Gentleman's , the Constitution of the Cape might suspended. I should like to ask her there is any foundation for that estion, because I think that is a er entirely beyond and apart from ; appears in the Blue-book. It seems e that the Cape Government in re-to this matter—and here I refer icularly to Mr. Schreiner — were st obliged to adopt the views, or, at vents, some of the views of the right Gentleman the Colonial Secretary.

here, in regard to Mr. Schreiner, I ld like to be allowed to say that this try and the Cape are to be congratu- l on the fact that throughout these blous times we have had in office at Cape a man so obviously loyal to t Britain. He has clearly tried to is duty as between the Dutch party the English party out there, and I k he deserves thoroughly well of this try and of his native country.

n not quarrelling in any way the method adopted by the right

Gentleman opposite in putting his s before the Cape Government, but I esire to offer some words of criticism gard to those views. It certainly is y deplorable thing that, as one of onsequences of the war, we should to deal with something like 10,000 ls who have been in arms against the sh Crown. But the question is owed down to one particular class of l. It is generally admitted, both by Secretary of State and the Cape Government, that those who may be called the ringleaders must be tried by some special Commission and made to suffer a penalty consonant with their crime. There is another class of rebels referred to by the right hon. Gentleman in his despatch—namely, those who can prove that they acted under strong compulsion ; and I do not imagine that any-one would press for their punishment. The only ones, therefore, we have to do with are “willing” rebels, who took up arms and assisted the enemy in districts occupied by the enemy, and of which we had surrendered possession. There is a considerable distinction to be drawn between men who joined the rebels from that part of the Cape still under British control, and those who joined from the districts from which British protection had been withdrawn. To judge from Sir Alfred Milner's despatch, the number of men who gratuitously left different parts of the Cape in order to join the enemy was very small, and I think it speaks very highly for the loyalty of those whose characters have been so aspersed by men who have supported this war throughout. Of the loyalty of the English population nothing is required to be said ; but I say it says much for the loyalty of the Dutch population that so very few joined the rebels, except in districts actually in possession of the enemy. I think that fact goes far to demonstrate that the alleged conspiracy of the Dutch against the English was not based on any solid foundation. I am bound to say there is one interesting despatch, in which it is shown that persons who did join the enemy actually made beforehand an appeal to Sir Alfred Milner and to the Cape Government for protection against the Orange Free State burghers, in order that they might be able to maintain their loyalty to the English Crown. But that protection was taken away, and they found themselves in a very difficult position indeed. One can hardly be surprised, although, of course, it is a matter for regret, that, in districts from which British protection had been withdrawn, and which were invaded by men of the same race, language and blood, the inhabitants were induced to take up arms against the Crown. Of course, they are to blame for so doing. But I think the chief blame for this position lies, not on these unfortunate misguided men, but on the Government and the right hon. Gentleman, for not having taken care that such a position should not possibly arise. The opportunity for joining and the temptation to join were given entirely by the action of the Government; it was their absolute want of foresight and preparation which caused the rebellion and made these men rebels. For the first time, I believe, in British history we had English territory invaded by foreign arms; and these persons were placed in the painful position of having to choose between blood and flag. More blame, therefore, attaches to the Government than to these misguided men. I do not desire to say, however, that it is a sufficient excuse for their having taken up arms against the Crown. They will, of course, have to suffer some punishment, and it will be only fair that they should do so, for otherwise they would be in a better position than their fellow-countrymen, who remained loyal to the Crown in the same districts; and who, unfortunately, have suffered very considerably from wanton and, in some cases, I am afraid to say, spiteful confiscation of and damage done to their property—damage which no money can really compensate for, and indeed these men cannot be too highly praised for their loyalty. I therefore quite agree that the rebels in question must undergo some punishment. But I also hold that some leniency may be shown to the rank and file, and perhaps, later, amnesty too. It is obvious that, in considering the question of punishment to be meted out in such circumstances, that punishment should have three qualities. It ought not to be vindictive; it ought not to be tainted with political bias; and it ought not to be continuous, or to leave an open sore for many years to come. What does the right hon. Gentleman propose? What is it he pressed on the Cape Government, and on a very reluctant Ministry? He proposed perpetual disfranchisement for these misguided men, and I venture to suggest that such a proposal contains all the three vices to which I have referred. Whatever may be the object in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, such a punishment will at all events be looked upon as vindictive as having a political taint, and its memory will rankle and remain for many years to come. Such a punishment as this is, it seems to me, the worst that could be inflicted at the present time, having regard to the future of the Cape.

Mr. Sydney Buxton.

I should like to draw the attention of the Committee to the irony of the situation. We went to war in order to enfranchise a certain number of British subjects. We have been told by the right hon. Gentleman in one of his speeches that he proposes to adopt the system of Crown Colony government in regard to the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. What does Crown Colony government mean? It means that those who have the franchise at present will lose it, and that those not already enfranchised will not receive it. And now he proposes, in order to carry out the policy of a war undertaken on behalf of a policy of enfranchisement, to disfranchise for life thousands of British subjects in other parts of South Africa. That seems to me to be a most curious result. It is one of the many unforeseen and unexpected outcomes of this conflict that the result of a war to increase the franchise is to disfranchise a large number of persons. I am not going to deny that, in some places and under certain conditions, wholesale disfranchisement of this sort may not be the best form, because a lenient form, of punishment that can be devised. But if ever there was a time when such a policy was bad, if ever there was a place in which it was unwise to enforce it, that time is the present, and that place is the Cape Colony. I cannot conceive a worse method, moment, or place for such punishment of rebellion. It immediately arouses suspicion as to the motives of the right hon. Gentleman and the Home Government. I am bound to say that one of the great evils of the whole position in South Africa during the last five years—since the right hon. Gentleman has been at the Colonial Office—has been the unbounded suspicion by certain sections of the community in South Africa as to his intentions and desires. I am not going to say whether those suspicions are right or wrong; that is not the question now. But surely this is the moment when the right hon. Gentleman and Sir Alfred Milner, who is more or less involved with him, should desire to allay such suspicions instead of accentuating them by widespread disfranchisement. Is there one thing more than another which would increase the suspicion than the present proposal for unlimited disfranchisement? No doubt the right hon. Gentleman will, when he speaks to-day, disclaim political or personal motives. But we had a speech other day from Lord James of ~~aford~~, a member of the Cabinet, somewhat cynical in its nature, and certainly expedient, which, to use a vulgar ~~use~~, "let the cat out of the bag." Lord James was talking about the war, he laid down the proposition that "it ~~ld~~ be the duty of the Government ~~ee~~ that those who were loyal, and ~~se~~ who obeyed the law, should be paramount in the exercise of political power." ~~ppose~~ he calls that "equal rights." ~~added~~ that "the destinies of these ~~ple~~ should no longer be controlled by votes or political actions of rebels." ~~it~~ may be right or wrong, but, at any ~~it~~, it shows the avowed objects and intentions of the Government in regard to his question. This is neither more nor than political proscription. It appears ~~ne~~ to be a case of jerryandering the constituencies with the object of turning minority into a majority. We heard a ~~d~~ deal at one time as to the desirability of "crushing Africandism." Now, we ~~told~~ that the object is to turn a Dutch ~~ority~~ into an English majority, and, in ~~urd~~ to this matter of punishment, I ~~ld~~ like to point out that the punishment will fall less heavily on the person ~~committed~~ the crime and more ~~vily~~ on the party to which he belongs—on his friends and kinsfolk. It ~~fall~~ on the Africander party, which ~~shown~~ singular self-control and great ~~ulty~~ in a very critical, dangerous, and ~~cult~~ position. I do not think the ~~it~~ hon. Gentleman will deny that the ~~lers~~ and majority of that party have ~~ibited~~ great control in their action ~~ing~~ the whole course of these unfortunate events. It seems to me you are ~~ig~~ to punish these men, not so much ~~use~~ they are rebels themselves, but ~~es~~ by their assistance Mr. Rhodes' power ~~broken~~, the Sprigg Government was ~~ed~~ out, and the policy of the right ~~. Gentleman~~ was more or less ~~arted~~. That, at any rate, will be ~~r~~ view of the nature of the punishment ~~it~~ inflicted. I heard a good deal ~~ut~~ a comparison between the ~~re~~ position and that which obtained ~~anada~~ after the Canadian rebellion, ~~he~~ time of Lord Durham. Personally, I admit I cannot see very much ~~logy~~ between the two cases. I cannot ~~erstand~~ how the arguments applicable ~~the~~ one can be applied to the other. ~~. in~~ the course of my reading I came across a letter some sentences in which are certainly applicable to the present position. Lord Durham, in his despatch, was dealing with the question which had been put forward of jerryandering the Canadian constituencies, and he said:—

"With respect to every one of these plans which propose to make the English minority an electoral majority by means of new and strange modes of voting, or unfair divisions of the country, I shall only say that, if the Canadians are to be deprived of representative government, it would be better to do it in a straightforward way than to attempt to establish a permanent system of government as the basis of what all mankind would regard as mere electoral frauds. It is not in North America that men can be cheated by an unreal semblance of representative government, or persuaded that they are outvoted when, in fact, they are disfranchised."

It seems to me that this paragraph is applicable to the present position, and I certainly cordially endorse the sentiments embodied in it. There is another point of some importance. We gather from these Blue-books that two Commissions are to be appointed to try the rebels—one a distinctly judicial Commission to deal with the ringleaders, and the other a quasi-judicial Commission to deal with the question of disfranchisement. It is suggested that the latter should consist of men free from political bias; but I venture to say that at the present moment neither in South Africa nor in this country is it possible to find a single man who could regard this matter free from political bias. However able these men may be, however much they may desire to carry out their duties, I am afraid that from the beginning they will be discredited, the Commission will be looked upon as a political organisation, and they will be subjected to a great temptation in a number of constituencies in which, by disfranchising a certain number of men, they will be able to alter the balance of political power. Therefore, instead of this proposal of the right hon. Gentleman for life-long disfranchisement diminishing the difficulties of the existing position, and being calculated to bring about peace and amity in South Africa, it will do more to accentuate the evils which unfortunately exist. I am not blaming Mr. Schreiner for adopting the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman. He was acting under great difficulty and was subjected to considerable pressure from the Home Government. But I am blaming the right hon.

Gentleman for the excessive and provocative proposals which he made to the Cape Government. We here are not in a position to dictate to the Cape Government, but we have a right to criticise or condemn any action which may be taken by our own Government. In a sense, no doubt, it is futile to do so, because at the Cape there is now in office a Government of another persuasion which will carry out such proposals as are made to it by the Secretary of State. But I think this House of Commons has a right to express an opinion on the subject of disfranchisement. I am afraid that the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman throws some light on the very great feeling of uneasiness which unquestionably exists both here and at the Cape as to the judicial proceedings which are taking place at the present moment. We have asked for information in regard to the civil and military courts and we have been unable to get it; indeed the right hon. Gentleman disclaims all responsibility. We want to know whether justice is being done, and we want to feel that the British power is not now being exercised in South Africa to carry out a system of persecution under the guise of civil and military law. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give the House some information as to the present operation of the Civil and Military law in South Africa. I do not think the outlook in South Africa is so rosy that we can afford, by disfranchisement or by the exercise of excessive powers, to add to the difficulties before us. The war is lingering on; no further honour or glory is to be got out of the war; the gilt is very considerably off the gingerbread. We have at present to do what we can, not to add to the difficulties that have to be met, but, as far as possible, to diminish them. I have been struck with the view which Sir Alfred Milner himself takes of the situation. The best that Sir Alfred Milner can say in regard to the outlook is that he does not "take a very gloomy view" of it. If the High Commissioner expresses himself thus, surely the outlook must be very bad and very gloomy. I only wish to add one word. It is that I do not desire on the present occasion to discuss the question of the future. It would be premature to do so. South Africa is in a state of chaos, and it is not possible for any person or Government really to decide on the matter in detail. I feel bound to say, however, that I am not prepared to contest the proposition that there must be some form of effective Imperial control in the future with regard to the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, but in what form it is to be applied it is premature to lay down. The mere fact of the war having lasted so long has made the position a more difficult one. It is obvious now that for a long time to come we must have a military occupation of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. The long delay will give time to allow differences to diminish, and to enable us to judge more fully of the sentiments existing at the Cape and here before committing ourselves to the details of the future. We ought to consult Dutch opinion at the Cape as well as English opinion. The longer the Government can delay making up their minds with regard to the details of the future the better I, for one, shall be satisfied. I am pleading for delay, for I believe it will afford the only chance of a satisfactory solution. I am sure that the hope of every Member of the House is that the war may come as speedily as possible to a conclusion.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I am glad the Government have afforded us this opportunity of discussing their policy in South Africa, and I certainly think that a debate on the salary of the Chief Secretary is quite germane, seeing that if there is one man more responsible than another for the war and all the horrors which are going on in South Africa it is the Colonial Secretary. Of course, the Government, as a whole, is responsible, but the right hon. Gentleman stands out from among them, and therefore I hold that we are fully entitled to discuss the question of his salary. The time has come when we may, so to speak, take stock and endeavour to find out what has been the real advantage to this country of this war policy. In doing so we must go back to the origin of the war. I suppose the only reason why we interfered with the Transvaal was that we thought it was badly governed. But what was the bad government? We said that the franchise was not arranged so satisfactorily as we could have wished. We said also that the rulers were corrupt; and, lastly, we complained that they chose to be governed by an oligarchy—a fact which seemed to trouble us most tremendously. But, after all, Mr. Kruger is only a typical Tory, and was carrying out the Tory policy in South Africa. Why this country could not stand Tory principles in South Africa I never could understand. It seems to me most extraordinary that we should have set ourselves to check these abuses. We have registration laws in this country which seem to be devised specially to prevent people from getting the franchise. Half the population—the women—are excluded altogether. Then I come to the charge of corruption. We alleged that public money was being devoted to private purposes in the Transvaal, but ever since 1895 most of the time of the House of Commons has been spent in giving public money to private individuals. Then there was the allegation that the Transvaal was governed by an oligarchy. Are not we in this country similarly governed? Is not the real power vested in the House of Lords? If we are justified in attacking a corrupt oligarchy in South Africa, then I hope the time is not far distant when hon. Members will join in attacking the corrupt oligarchy which prevails in this country. But remember that the Boers were attached to all these abuses just as hon. Members opposite are attached to similar abuses in this country. I venture to assert, however, that if a foreign army were to come to this country with the avowed intention of sweeping away the House of Lords, Radicals, Democrats, and Socialists would promptly join in resisting them to the death, however much they may dislike the House of Lords, because we all have an innate love of the freedom of nations. Nations all like to be governed by themselves, and it is that love of freedom which has enabled the Boers to resist for so long the overwhelming forces we have launched against them. 220,000 of our men have been kept at bay by not more than 70,000 Boers. If military glory is anything more than hypocrisy, than a delusion and a snare, then I think that glory is with the men who have been fighting against us. It has been a case of the weak against the strong, of the oppressed against the oppressor, and of the freeman against the tyrant. Before the war broke out we were told that its object was to defend our colonies, and that it was produced by the ultimatum delivered by the Boers. I believe the real ultimatum was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, which was sent several days before President Kruger handed in his. Is this a war of defence, or is it to be one of extermination? How have we been speaking and writing about our enemies? A correspondent of the Morning Post not very long since wrote of the joy he had experienced in seeing the smoke of a rebel's burning house, and he spoke of the Boers as vermin. That is the way in which certain portions of the press are in the habit of talking about the Boers, and yet I find in the Daily News a very different character given to these men. The writer desired to place it on record that, in his opinion, the Boer farmer is clean in his home life, that his domestic arrangements are pure, and that he compares very favourably with the farming classes in Australia, America, and Great Britain. How is it that Englishmen are acting so contrary to all their previous instincts and habits, and are rejoicing in the attempts to deprive these people of their independence? The only doctrine held by the people of this country which would enable this war to go on is that they believe their country must be backed up whether it is right or wrong. That is the opinion held by the man in the street, the man in the pulpit, the man in the newspaper office, and the man in the House of Commons, but the doctrine is as false as false can be, and it strikes at the root of all national religion, honour, truth, and morality. What is this doctrine of "Our country, right or wrong," leading to in South Africa at the present moment? It is leading to the crushing out of two independent Republics. What are the two Republics? One was the Orange Free State; but you have blotted out the "free" now. An impartial observer, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen, long before this war broke out, said that the government of the Orange Free State was about the very best as regarded freedom and comfort the world had ever seen. You are fighting at this moment to prevent that government being carried on. Such a policy is the policy of the freebooter, the filibuster, the burglar, and the Boxer. Everything is on the debit side; there is nothing at all to our credit. What have we lost? We have lost boundless treasure; we have lost countless men and noble lives; we have lost our prestige and our position in the world. ["Oh!"] That is why you cannot send anybody to China. We have lost our character. Never again can England pose as the friend of freedom, the protector of the weak, the guardian of the oppressed. She has fallen from her high estate, and thinks now of nothing but supremacy, and paramountcy, and Empire. We shall be told that this is a vote of censure upon the Colonial Secretary; that, at least, is my object, because no man has done so much to bring about this state of things as the Colonial Secretary. He stands head and shoulders above his colleagues—or, shall I say, his accomplices—in the efforts which have been made to support and carry on this odious and un-English policy. But I should like to make use of his own words of four years ago in condemning this very policy. They are words well known to the House; but in every debate upon South Africa they out to be read, and also at every public meeting and in every discussion, hackneyed though they may be—

"A war in South Africa would be one of the most serious wars that could possibly be waged. It would be in the nature of a civil war. It would be a long war, a bitter war, and a costly war, and, as I have pointed out already, it would leave behind it the embers of a strife which I believe generations would not be long enough to extinguish. To go to war with President Kruger in order to force upon him reforms in the internal affairs of his State, in which Secretaries of State have repudiated all right of interference, that would be a course of action as immoral as it would be unwise." *

That is the course of action the Colonial Secretary has now taken, and by taking it he has brought discredit, degradation, demoralisation and, probably, disaster upon his country. For that reason I say he deserves the censure of every friend of humanity, peace, and justice. I beg to move a reduction of the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A (Salaries) be reduced by £100, in respect of the Salary of the Secretary of State."—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT (Durham) said the hon. Baronet had spoken in what he thought were the interests of peace, but there was nothing in the speech which would enable the country to take a better position or to come to sounder conclusions than were to be found in the Blue-books, nor were there in it any suggestions likely to be helpful in the present difficulties. In the speech of the late Under Secretary for the Colonies there were some things with which he agreed and others with which he disagreed. The hon. Member seemed to argue that it was impossible to think of the future, but that was just what the House ought to think of. He had read the Blue-books, and to his mind there never was more painful reading. Neither side seemed to have the slightest power to enter into the difficulties and prepossessions of the other. That was a difficult task, but it was the task the Imperial Government and the country had to undertake. They had to look at both sides, and avoid not only the fact, but even the appearance of being led away by local faction. It was the duty of the Government to see that justice was carried through, and that men did not suffer for having been true to the flag. This was almost the last debate of the present session, and very likely the last debate on the subject of South Africa in the present Parliament. Before Parliament reassembled the constituencies, north, south, east, and west, would have been addressed, and it was important that they should consider the spirit which should animate the policy to be adopted. Members of Parliament were somewhat like a flock of sheep, and the speech of the Colonial Secretary that day would be all important because, in all probability, it would indicate the line of policy to which the great majority of this House of Commons, when it revisited the constituencies, would address themselves; and he said without hesitation that any candidate who thought when he addressed the electorate that he would gain popularity by exciting animosity against the enemies who had been fighting against us, or by beating the big war drum, would be acting a part hostile to the highest interest of the country. He looked with confidence to the Colonial Secretary and the Government to indicate, as they had indicated by some of their despatches, that they were not actuated by vindictive motives, and that they would in anything they said—which would really be addressed to the country—accentuate that line and show they were true to the policy which they had professed to hold all through of working steadily, unforgetfully, and persistently to build up in South Africa a free and self-governing community. That, after all, was the great object for which they should work, and then Unionist Members who supported them could go to the country feeling they were supporting a noble policy. As to the Blue-books, there were two points as to which vehement discussion took place between one side or the other—the questions of annexation and the treatment of the rebels. Both were open to differences of opinion on the part of honourable and patriotic men, and to say that those who opposed annexation were the enemies of their country was to talk nonsense. He did not condemn gentlemen who took that view as unpatriotic and untrue citizens, but he did say that those who argued in favour of setting up again two independent or quasi-independent nationalities in South Africa were shutting their eyes to facts. All such ideas must be abandoned; the system had been tried and it had failed. He did not hesitate to say he would have been more patient and have given it a longer trial, but it was gone, and gone for ever. In his opinion the only chance South Africa now had of good, free, and progressive government was in a combination under the British flag, but that again was a question on which men differed and might differ as patriotic men. With regard to how rebels should be treated, he supposed everybody agreed that those who had borne arms against the Crown must be punished. On this point there did not appear to be much difference between the two parties in Cape Colony. Both sides had come to the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary, in proceeding against the rebels, to depart from the procedure of the ordinary law. That might be a wise conclusion, but it was undoubtedly an uncommonly strong one. He should like to point out that in the rebellions of 1715, 1745, and 1780 they had never tried persons otherwise than by the ordinary law—trial by jury.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Judge Jeffreys.

*MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT said he was taking the troubles in this country onwards from the Revolution, and Judge Jeffreys was before the period he referred to.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said surely the hon. Member did not advise them to follow such a precedent in this case. He knew what was the justice that was meted out to the rebels on the occasions of which he spoke. Surely he did not suggest that they should mete out similar treatment to the rebels in this case.

*MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT said he certainly did not. His argument was that both sides, as represented by the arguments in the Blue-books, had come to a very strong but also to a right conclusion, but he desired to point out that even the Dutch in South Africa were willing to go lengths which the Government of this country had not gone in the case of the rebellions referred to. He thought in that they were proceeding on the only lines on which some sort of reasonable justice could be meted out. Before he left the subject of the war he desired to refer, for the sake of obtaining an explanation, to Lord Roberts's despatch of 1st June, containing his proclamation warning the inhabitants of the Orange River Colony that after fourteen days those who were found in arms would be liable to be dealt with as rebels. He would like to have a legal explanation as to how it was that one of the belligerents could turn armed enemies in the field, by issuing a proclamation, into rebels. Supposing a war broke out between France and England, and the island of Jersey fell into the hands of the French, would it be maintained that by issuing a proclamation annexing the British territory the French, in consequence of the proclamation, turned those who had been enemies into rebels? He could not understand how, in accordance with the ordinary usages of warfare and the ordinary doctrines of international law, the terms of Lord Roberts's proclamation could be justified. The Committee had not on this occasion to deal with the policy before the war; they had to look ahead. He was glad to think that, before very long, peace would be established. Then would come their difficulties and trials. Whatever Government was in power would be faced with those difficulties, but hon. Members had not indicated in any degree how they should be met. To think that without any exceptional coercive and punitive means everything would come right was to blind themselves to existing facts. He did not see how they could get a very much better Minister than the Colonial Secretary to introduce and give effect to the working of a system of local government in South Africa. There was nothing in the right hon. Gentleman's career to show that he set less value than the rest of them on local institutions. As to Sir Alfred Milner, he did not know whether he would be the Minister who was to restore peace and build up a system of local government in South Africa, but Sir Alfred Milner would be the first to recognise that the energies and qualities and abilities necessary to conduct a great war to a successful issue were of a different kind from those qualities required to build up a peaceful system of government among jarring nations. Without tact, judgment, and the exercise of very considerable patience, what was the result they should bring themselves to? He did not think there was any harm in mentioning it, for everyone must know that the result would be the suspension of constitutional government in Cape Colony. That was a disaster which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would keep them clear of, and he trusted that he would lead them to the building up of free constitutional government throughout South Africa.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs): I believe that if the spirit which has characterised the speech of my hon. friend who has just spoken had been more apparent in the House and in the country during the last twelve months, this wretched war might have been averted, or, at all events, the difficulties in which we now find ourselves would have been considerably reduced. As a matter of fact, I do not think anyone who remembers the reckless methods which have been adopted, and almost countenanced by those in high authority, in regard to public meeting and free speech throughout the country, can say that they have been conceived in the spirit of the speech of the hon. Member. But I am glad to believe that there is now obtaining a more sober view in regard to this public calamity and the intense danger of the situation in which we have been placed than was the case a few months ago. I can assure the House I shall endeavour to do nothing to diminish that sobriety. This is the first opportunity we have had for some time of considering the policy which has landed us in our present position, and it is the last opportunity we shall have during this present session of Parliament, and it may be during this Parliament. It is therefore our duty, without bitterness and, at all events, with frankness, fearlessly to consider the position in which we find ourselves, and to criticise the policy which has led to it, with a view, if possible, of diminishing the dangers which are to come. It is said that it is useless to criticise, and in some sense that is true. If we ask questions I do not think the answers are always very full. When we wished to raise a discussion on the proper terms of settlement before they had been concluded by the absolute declarations of the Government and the actual annexation of the Orange Free State, we were prevented by a blocking notice which the Government did not think it proper to take steps to remove. If we blame the policy of the Government, we have until recently been told what is absolutely untrue—that we are the enemies of the country, or that we are animated by some personal spirit towards the Colonial Secretary, which also is untrue. If any Members on this side of the House venture to agree with the Government, their position is still more unfortunate, because I find that Lord James of Hereford, the other day, spoke of my hon. friends in terms which I will read to the Committee. He said—

“Who are the Liberal Imperialists, and what do they mean? They come as candidates before the constituencies, and they say, ‘We are Liberals, and we support the policy of Her Majesty’s Government in relation to that question which in the coming election must be the only question before the people of this country.’ I object to Unionist candidates being opposed by men who have nothing to say but that they think the Government is right in what they are doing. I want to have the fight fairly fought. Unionists do not want to see the white flag hoisted, and then to be fired at from under its protection.”

I am not one of those Liberal Imperialists; I have a very imperfect conception of what Liberal Imperialism means. But I must say that it is a very curious political situation, in which the chief offence which can be perpetrated from this side of the House against a Government is to express a sincere belief in the wisdom of the policy of the Government. I regret, with all goodwill and perfect frankness, the differences on this side of the House; they have gone far to paralyse the usefulness of the Liberal party and of the Opposition. I regret the position most deeply; I hope it will be of short duration; but I am perfectly certain that the misfortune will not be diminished or the period of its duration shortened by maintaining silence in regard to the opinions we hold. The hon. Gentleman opposite said we ought to look at the actual facts and circumstances. I will look at them, and I shall confine myself to looking at them simply from the point of view of the interests of our own country and of the British Empire. If any questions of ethics obtrude themselves, let the Government settle them with their own party. The war has now lasted for nine or ten months; we have occupied the capital of both the enemies' States; we have established beyond question the military supremacy of this country. If anybody doubted—as it was said the Boers doubted, although we always knew better—the courage of the British soldiers, that doubt has been removed by the uncomplaining courage of our troops—a courage which has never been surpassed in the annals of the world. What are the losses? What is the present diminution of the effective force in South Africa? In killed, captured, and those invalided home, I believe the total amounts to 35,000 men.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Oh, more than that!

SIR ROBERT REID: You have to add to that number those who are at present in hospital in South Africa. I do not know what that number is, but I believe it is something like 20,000. That is to say we have sustained a diminution of our effective force after nine months fighting equal to 55,000 men. There is no man in this House who does not feel the deepest sympathy with the men who have exposed themselves and suffered as these men and the bereaved relations have done. And what has been the cost of this policy? Including the temporary force for home defence, I make it that the cost amounts to something like £60,000,000, and I am afraid we cannot absolutely say the war is yet over. It is uncertain how long it may last. I hope most heartily that the enemy will soon desist from an unequal struggle which can lead to nothing but further bloodshed and further misery. We cannot, however, yet pronounce the war ended; I wish we could. There is another accomplished fact which deserves attention. There has been an intense bitterness created in the Cape Colony and Natal—a reign of hatred and suspicion between the two races. There are complaints, to which my hon. friend alluded—complaints of the abuse of martial law. I cannot enter upon that matter; I have no materials for the purpose. I am not prepared to accept newspaper statements as sufficient ground for making so grave an indictment. But this I say: while martial law during time of war and in the areas occupied by the fighting forces is often and probably in this case necessary, there is nothing more liable to abuse, and there are some precepts which ought to be observed with the greatest possible care. There never ought to be a refusal to allow legal advice to be taken; there never ought to be detention for an undue space of time before trial; there never ought to be—in law there never can be—in regard to civil offences a martial court sitting alongside a civil court. From the moment the civil power is able to re-assert itself martial law in regard to civil offences becomes unlawful and is one of the gravest crimes that can be perpetrated. There has been complaint of that, but that is for the Cape Parliament primarily to inquire into; the responsibility is theirs, and they have the means for active inquiry which we have not. But the fact remains that a population which has hitherto been living in perfect harmony, whatever their ulterior designs may have been—about which much that is foolish has been said—are now divided into hostile camps corresponding with racial differences—a most grave and dangerous condition of things. Let me look for a moment at the future. Soon, I trust, peace will be re-established. I am afraid it will be re-established only by such a destruction of life among the adult population of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal as will make further military resistance impossible, but it will be restored, I hope, soon, and then will begin the duty of the Government of governing those countries in the name of the Queen. Let me look first at the conquered territory. To govern that country will be an experience absolutely unique in the history of this nation, and, I believe, in the history of the world. The two colonies taken together comprise a country nearly the size of France, 6,000 miles away from you by sea, and many hundreds of miles inland. The population, whose extraordinary bravery and military capacity no one can deny, is a white population, a population kindred to ourselves, with a degree of kinship with which only the curious are really acquainted. The British population is insignificant except near Johannesburg. I assume that disarmament will of necessity follow—so far as we can effect disarmament. It cannot be wholly effected, because the native population very greatly outnumbers the white. It is not a very easy task to disarm a population occupying a territory the size of France, very far away from our immediate control, with the enormous border the country has, and a very scant white population. For some time, no doubt, the Boers will be so stunned by the terrific blow that has been levelled against them that they will be quiescent and unable to take any active hostile part. That may be so, but there is too much reason to fear, from the lessons of history, from the history of the Dutch race itself, that they will not long acquiesce in their conquest. A great army must be maintained there, with long lines of communication through existing colonies which are by no means likely to acquiesce in the subjugation of their fellow-countrymen. We know what guerilla warfare means, and how dangerous it is in a difficult country a long way from your base. How many troops will be needed in the two conquered Republics for the purpose of maintaining the authority of the Crown, and how long will they be required? If it is the opinion of the Colonial Secretary, as quoted from his speech by the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth, that the feeling of hostility which would be created by a war with South Africa will last for generations, what is the prospect for us? We have a vast Empire which it is supposed we care for; the love of this Empire is supposed to be confined entirely to the hon. Gentlemen opposite with whom we have the misfortune temporarily to differ. What is the prospect for anyone who takes a pride in the Empire? What is our position in China, and what are our duties all over the world? Is it possible that this should be overlooked by anyone who seriously approaches the problem? This great military force which will be required at the Cape will have to be maintained at the cost of the people of this country. We cannot place the charge on Cape Colony or Natal, and if we want to get money from the Transvaal it will have to be from the mines and the minerals, and you will find that you will not get more than enough, if enough, to pay the interest on some part of the loans you have raised for the purposes of this war. What is the prospect, too, in Cape Colony itself? The population there is, at all events, four to three, perhaps three to two, Dutch as against British, and you have only to read Sir Alfred Milner's own despatches to see that they have the keenest sympathy with the Boers, and the keenest desire that you shall not extirpate the last vestige of a nation in which they take so great an interest. Disfranchisement is threatened. The Colonial Secretary threatened it in his despatch as a penal necessity. Personally I do not at all think that disfranchisement for a period of five years, for example, having regard to what the old laws of treason were, is a punishment of very undue severity; but looked at from the point of view of the hon. Member for Poplar it will be a method of disturbing the constitutional balance of that country. Is it likely to affect the balance? Ten thousand is stated by Sir A. Milner as being the number which will be affected by this abolition of the franchise. I do not know if they are all voters, but even if they are, it is a very small method of trying to affect the constitutional balance of the country, and it cannot be effective because the effect will only be short. But we have to consider more than that; we have also to consider the possibility indicated by the hon. Member for Durham—the possibility of being called upon to suppress the Constitution of Cape Colony. We were much relieved by the observations of Lord James of Hereford, who has been kind enough to speak plainly on this subject. After formulating the principle which he thought ought to prevail, he proceeded to say that, if it were necessary to enforce this simple plan, even though the Constitution were suspended, he believed there would be a strong note of disapprobation not only in this country, but in every colony enjoying free government. If any such necessity arises it will be the most complete and decisive condemnation that could be conceived of the policy which has been pursued towards South Africa. The secret of the unity of the British Empire is that we do not attempt to govern our white fellow-subjects. No one has described more eloquently that feature of the British Empire than the Colonial Secretary upon the Australian Commonwealth Bill. But if we were to violate that essential condition of our Empire in South Africa, must not everyone feel that, quite apart from the question of South Africa, the most gloomy forebodings might be raised among other colonies as to the tenure of their freedom resting upon a precarious basis? If the Government are going to suspend the Constitution in Cape Colony they will find that there will be opened a bottomless pit into which they will have to throw the blood and treasure of the people of this country, which it is the primary duty of the Government to protect. These are the dangers of this policy, the results of which are visible to all men's minds. They cannot much longer be concealed by complacent newspapers. There is one chance only, and that is that under an absolutely just and beneficent Government the angry and rankling feelings created in South Africa by the war may gradually subside and be replaced by peace and progress. Those who favour the Government hope that the nationality of the Boers will be merged in a South African nationality, and that the devotion they have shown to their own flag may be transferred to us. I most earnestly hope that that consummation may arise. But I wish I could share the belief that it is likely to arise. Of this I am perfectly certain—every harsh exercise of the power of martial law will retard it; every sneering attempt to fix disaffection upon the whole of the Dutch race will retard it. The only chance of that consummation must rest upon the conviction of the Dutch community that the privileges and rights of the English in the colonies will be extended on an equal footing to the Dutch also, provided they do not transgress the law. The situation in South Africa has been created by the policy of Her Majesty's Government. I am not going to trouble the House by going over the ground again, which has already been traversed. The situation has been created by the policy of the Government, and it is on that ground that I am going to vote for the Amendment of my hon. friend. I have always held that the Boer ultimatum and invasion of the British territory were wholly indefensible. But these were the outcome of the menacing and harassing course pursued by the Government, and principally by the Colonial Secretary. The evil can only be cured by the healing virtue of moderation and forbearance; and I trust that the Colonial Secretary, who is a man of extraordinary intellectual powers, will show in his treatment of the situation that he possesses these qualities.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down fulfilled the promise of his opening remarks by the propriety and sobriety of his language and the sweet reasonableness of his arguments, and it may be convenient that at this stage I should say a few words—they will not be many—in reply to what he has advanced. I confess that I looked forward to this debate with great interest and great eagerness. I regretted that it was necessarily postponed by the greater urgency of other matters which have had days of Supply devoted to them. I was anxious for this debate, because I desired in this great controversy to secure a clear issue. There is room, no doubt, for differences of opinion, even for extreme differences of conscientious opinion, and if once differences exist there is only one tribunal we can appeal to to settle them. But in order that that tribunal may settle them, and settle them satisfactorily, it must be in possession of the whole case. It must be in the possession, therefore, not merely of the views of the Government, which I think have been fully and frankly expressed, and which I am prepared to repeat, but it must also be in the possession of the views of the Opposition. To this debate, then, I have looked in order that we may gather for the information of the country the views of the Opposition upon this matter, so that when the time comes we may obtain a fair decision upon it. An Amendment has been moved by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cokermouth Division to reduce the salary of the Secretary of State. The hon. Baronet has himself explained to the House the sense in which he understands the vote on his Amendment will be taken. If there be other matters upon which it is desired to censure the Secretary of State, it is possible, of course, to move reductions in the Vote upon which those other questions can be raised. But it cannot lie in the mouth of those who vote for this Amendment to say, "I did not vote because I am opposed to the war. On the contrary, I am a Liberal Imperialist. I only voted because I think the Colonial Secretary did not act discreetly with respect to the complaints of some official in Ceylon or Barbados." That will not do. I do not conceive for a moment it would suggest itself to the minds of any hon. Gentlemen opposite that they should adopt such a course as that.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Then why suggest it?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Very good. So far we are entirely agreed. Then, what is the issue upon which we are going to take a vote? Let me say that I think also those who refrain from voting will find themselves in a difficult position. They will have something to explain. After all, this is, as the hon. and learned gentleman said, a most serious discussion. We are engaged in the greatest war of our generation. The cost of life and treasure has been tremendous. The whole question, then, of the policy of the war, of the continuance of the war, and of the results of the war—all that is the greatest question which this House has had to consider. And upon that there can be no neutral ground. There must be a vote on one side or on the other. Nothing could be more contemptible in politics than that in such a case as this, where the existence, the security, and the honour of the nation are at stake, anyone present in the House should run out of it on the division.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: We are all agreed in that.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: So far, then, we are agreed. We shall get the issue which I have no doubt both of us desire. The issue raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Cockermouth Division is that the whole policy of the war is wrong; that the war is wrong, and as a consequence—the only logical and necessary consequence—that the annexation of the two Republics is wrong, and that their independence ought to be restored. That, also, is the view frankly expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down. In fact, I can conceive of no other that can be taken by any man who honestly and conscientiously believes that this war is an unjust and an unrighteous war. To say that the war is unjust and unrighteous, and then to vote for punishing the innocent and giving something to the guilty—allowing the guilty to profit by their guiltiness—that is a most illogical and immoral doctrine, and on that issue we are very glad to challenge the judgment of the House. What is the position taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman? He laid a great deal of stress on, and spoke with much feeling of, the misery which has been caused by this war—the loss of life and money, and so forth. But surely the hon. and learned Gentleman must know as well as everyone else that all that is absolutely irrelevant. It is an appeal to sentiment which has nothing to do with the issue we are trying. Of course it may be an argument against all war.

SIR ROBERT REID: Really, it is a new method of controversy that the right hon. Gentleman is adopting—[Cheers, and, as Mr. Chamberlain refused to give way, loud Ministerial cries of "Order, order!"] I wish to correct a statement of the right hon. Gentleman, but, of course, if he will not allow me to do so I will sit down.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: If the hon. and learned Gentleman has any correction to make I will give way at once. But he was making a new argument.

SIR ROBERT REID: I have a correction to make. My reason for voting for the reduction is that I believe that his policy has been disastrous to his country.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have no doubt. That was also the statement of the hon. Baronet as well as of the hon. and learned Member who followed him. But that is not a correction. That is what I have been pressing upon the Committee from the beginning as the issue. I have also incidentally defined what that policy is to which the hon. and learned Gentleman is entirely opposed. But the hon. and learned Gentleman's interruption refers to an earlier part of my speech.

Mr. J. Chamberlain

What I was saying at the moment was that all these statements made by him or by anyone else with regard to the terrible fruits of war are not relevant to the question whether the war is just and righteous or not. Assume that we were all agreed that it was just and righteous—still it would be equally true to say that there would have been great loss of life and all these terrible results which the hon. Gentleman puts before us in such moving language. It is irrelevant language. You must not judge the war by the loss of life and limb incurred, but by other considerations altogether. The greatest war of our times—a war in which thousands lost their lives where in this war only units have done so—the great Civil War of America, even Mr. Bright defended as a just and righteous war. Yet the loss and suffering caused by it was infinite in comparison with that of the present war. But the hon. and learned Gentleman went on to say that as a result of this war—which, I suppose, we ought to have taken into account when the policy which led to the war was entered upon—there has been a creation of race hatred in South Africa which it will take generations to cure. We can claim that we were not unaware of that. The very paragraph which has been quoted, and with which substantially I entirely agree, shows that we were fully aware that if we did enter into this war it would be a great calamity, and, therefore, we had every reason to avoid it. Our contention, which is part of the issue on which the Committee will vote, and which the hon. and learned Gentleman honestly and conscientiously disputes, is that we could not avoid the war, that the war was inevitable as well as just, and that we have to take these consequences, terrible as they are, as a result of a war which we believe to be just. I must, however, be permitted to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman takes no account of history at all when he talks of the creation of race feeling. It would be very difficult to fix the exact time at which that race feeling began to develop itself. The one thing we can say is that its appearance was synchronous with the activity of the Afrikaner Bond. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Poplar spoke in rather large terms of the necessity of doing justice to the loyalty of the Dutch, of a recognition of the loyal position taken up by the leaders of the Afrikaner Bond, and of the necessity of consulting them in regard to any future settlement. Sir, let us understand one another. I observe that hon. Gentlemen opposite very often talk of the Dutch as though the race difference were a race difference alone. It is not so. There are Dutchmen and Dutchmen. There are the Dutch who have been disloyal, and the Dutch who, with every difficulty in their way, incurring thereby the hatred and persecution of many of their own people, bravely stood up for us. They have been loyal to the flag which protects them, and recognise the advantages which they enjoyed under the British Crown. Why did not the hon. Member make that distinction clear? Which of the Dutch is it that we are to consult? What section of the Dutch is it? That which has been loyal?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: If the right hon. Gentleman asks me, I will tell him. What I said is that the Afrikaner Bond as a whole, leaders and members, had, in spite of enormous difficulties, remained loyal and had not taken part in this rebellion.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: On what authority does the hon. Gentleman make that statement? What justification has he for standing the guarantor of the loyalty of the leaders of the Afrikaner Bond? I want the Committee to remember that this debate is addressed to two audiences. It is addressed to England, where any vagaries of the hon. Gentleman will be estimated at their true value. But what is to be the effect of such a statement as that in South Africa at the present time, where you have one of the leaders of the Bond, a late Minister of Her Majesty's Government, Mr. Te Water, addressing a meeting of the Bond and saying that the only fault of the Ministry was that they had allowed the Cape Colony of Her Majesty to be used by British soldiers? Is that the opinion that the hon. Gentleman thinks it would have been right and wise for us to consult? What word has he used in the whole of his speech to recognise the loyalty of those other Dutchmen and of that vast majority of British colonists who, as I say, have held to the British Crown and flag in circumstances of the greatest difficulty? Not a word of recognition. Not one atom of sympathy for their sufferings. The hon. Gentleman palliates rebellion. He condones rebellion. He thinks that five years disfranchisement is an excessive punishment for a rebel, for a man who, having absolutely no grievance of any kind, but enjoying the utmost liberty and freedom, has taken up arms against Her Majesty, shot her soldiers, and looted the property and outraged the persons of Her Majesty's loyal subjects.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I do not like to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but I did refer to the loyal colonists. I spoke of them as deserving well of their country. I said it more than once. I distinguished between them and the rebels, and I said I was not arguing that five years disfranchisement was too great a sentence. I was referring to the right hon. Gentleman's proposal of a life-long disfranchisement. I did not refer to it in regard to its leniency; but I said that at the present time that form of punishment was the worst that could be chosen.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not remember the observation of the hon. Gentleman; what I do remember was that he said that Mr. Schreiner deserved well of the country, but I do not remember he said a single word in favour of any of the—

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I did.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Then of course I accept his statement. Now I come to the point which the hon. Gentleman has just referred to. He occupied, I suppose, twenty minutes in denouncing a proposal for lifelong disfranchisement, which was only put forward by me in answer to a request from the Cape Government to state what might, in my opinion, be what would be right and proper. It was not pressed, as the hon. Gentleman says. It has been abandoned in favour of the still more moderate and still more lenient proposal for five years disfranchisement, which was not made by me but which was made by the Attorney General of the Cape Government before they knew what my opinions were, and which has been adopted by the present Cape Ministers.

Mr. J. Chamberlain.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): Has the abandonment of the life-long disfranchisement your approval?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No abandonment was necessary. I had no right to dictate to the Cape Government, and I never attempted to. They asked me for suggestions, and I made my suggestions; and let me say now with regard to those suggestions that I think they were the most lenient, the most moderate, the most reasonable that could possibly have been administered. Personally, I still consider that it would have been very much better that the penalty for the class of rebels who are under consideration should have been life-long disfranchisement, of course leaving it open to Her Majesty's Government or to the Cape Government at any time to re-enfranchise the men if they found the circumstances would justify it. A life-long disfranchisement is considered to be a considerable punishment—an excessive punishment the hon. Gentleman called it. I wonder whether he knows what the Cape law is. The Cape law is that a man who is convicted for treason may be sentenced to death, may be imprisoned for life or any shorter term, may be fined to the full extent of his fortune, but he must be disfranchised for life. My hon. friend the Member for Durham spoke about an extraordinary proceeding we were lending our support to for establishing a Special Commission. He quoted cases in which rebels had been tried by the ordinary law of the land. Interrupting him I inquired whether my hon. friend wanted to press upon the Government the adoption of the plan adopted in 1715 and 1745.

*MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT said that he approved altogether of the substitution of a special Commission for trial by jury.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: What I was going to say was that the Special Commission was the proposal of the late Cape Ministers, and was assented to by the gentlemen who afterwards resigned from the Ministry on the point of disfranchisement. To have had all the men, perhaps thousands in number, tried by jury would have been impracticable; certainly it would not have conduced to a just verdict in all cases. Considering the heat and feeling which undoubtedly preveiled I think it might have been possible to predict what the verdict would be, and I think the Cape Government took a proper course in deciding to have a special tribunal. Then there is no difference of opinion either between the late Cape Government or the dissentient Ministers and Her Majesty's Government as to the treatment of the ringleaders. I imagine that as to persons who have committed acts contrary to the usages of war, or who have otherwise behaved in an exceptionally bad manner, it is agreed by all that they must be brought to trial by the Special Commission. Then there remain those who have either been willing to join the rebels, or who have been able to show that they joined under compulsion. The hon. Member for Poplar assured the Committee that very few have willingly joined. I take exception altogether to that statement.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: What I said was that Sir Alfred Milner's despatch showed that very few had willingly or gratuitously joined.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I entirely misunderstood the hon. Member. But I differ from the hon. Member still with regard to the inference he draws from Sir Alfred Milner's despatch. As certain as anything can possibly be, what happened was this—the Cape Colonists who sympathised with the rebels, sent word to the rebels inviting them to come, and promised that if they came in they would rise and join. They wanted an excuse—an appearance of compulsion at any rate—but the despatches which we have been able to obtain, the despatches from the Boer officers themselves, show that when they came in they were heartily welcomed. They had no difficulty whatever in commandeering those who afterwards joined. After the Boers had commandeered the willing colonists they dealt with the loyal colonists. In most cases they gave them eight days notice to quit—sometimes less—unless they would join them and fight against their own flag and their own country. That was the treatment which was meted out to loyalists, and now the assumption is, according to the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that we are to take no account whatever of that—that the men who have so behaved, who have willingly rebelled against the flag, are to come back, are to find their farms preserved for them, in many cases by British soldiers, and are to be able, if they so please, to taunt those who were loyal with the loss of their property and the injury to themselves and their families. I say that is an intolerable state of things. But, as I have explained in one of my despatches, the policy of Her Majesty's Government is not a vindictive policy. Revenge does not enter into our minds, nor, as I believe, does it enter into the minds of any reasonable people in this country. What we want is prevention. We do not want rebellion to be made so easy and so profitable that if any difficulty at any future time recurs, the same men may again go out in arms against us. What do we propose in the case of the men who have behaved as I have described? We do not propose to submit them to the death penalty or to imprison them; we do not propose to even fine them, but we propose to disarm them politically for five years. This is the whole punishment. It was said we should disarm them as far as possible. Is it not illogical to say you are to take away the rifles which these people have used for certain purposes injurious to the British Empire, and that you are going to give them votes in order to do the same thing by other means? I will not attempt to quote the words of the hon. Member for Poplar, but the whole implication of his speech was that a punishment was being imposed for the rebellion which ought not to be imposed.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I did not say that five years disfranchisement was an excessive punishment, but I said that, under the present circumstances of the Cape, disfranchisement was the worst and most inexpedient form of punishment that could be imposed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have just found what I put down while the hon. Member was speaking. He said disfranchisement is the worst method, taken in the worst place and at the worst time. Then he says he did not object to that punishment. That was the whole argument of the hon. Gentleman. One reason, he says, why we should not have done this is that it raises suspicion about the Colonial Secretary. I am quite aware there are many suspicions about the Colonial Secretary. Whom have I to thank for that? The suspicions are all derived from the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite; they are not derived from fact. They are not derived in the least from fact, they are not derived from anything I have said, from anything I have written, from anything I have done, but they are derived from ignoble motives which hon. Gentlemen have imputed to me, from articles in the press, from Conciliation Committees, and Stop-the-war Committees, and from their literature, which I do not read, but which I see when it comes back to me from South Africa as having been quoted and repeated by some of the leaders, I will not say of the rebellion, but I will say some of those who are hostile to the British position in South Africa. Yes, I know what the suspicions amount to, and I do not hesitate to say what was the object of hon. Gentlemen. They have undoubtedly seriously embarrassed from the beginning to the end the very hard and difficult work in which I have been engaged. At the same time I have taken one course, I have spoken plainly, I have endeavoured to say exactly what I mean, so that no one could misunderstand me, and I believe, in the long run at any rate, that that will prove to have been the best course. I think I have really dealt with most of what has been said. I would, however, refer to one expression of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth, or of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, who complained that people called him and his friends the enemies of their country. Well, Sir, I really do not know of any one who has made any such charge against either the hon. and learned Gentleman or the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth. But, when the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth says of his countrymen that they are "free-booters," "burglars," and "Boxers," it is very difficult indeed to represent him as a friend of his country. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, although I do not think he defined his position very clearly, as I understand is against the annexation of the two Republics. If so, will he bear this in mind, that in the first place he is opposing himself to the unanimous opinion of all the great self-governing colonies who have assisted us in this matter. That is one point on which through all their Governments they had officially communicated their opinion before we came to a decision. He is going against the opinion of every loyal Englishman and Dutchman in Natal and in the Cape Colony. He is going against the opinion, I believe, of nine out of ten of his own countrymen. It is true the hon. Baronet says the country has gone mad. Well, we know that frame of mind; there are a good number of people who hold that opinion, that all the rest of the world is mad, but then they are generally shut up. But, although hon. Gentlemen are perfectly at liberty to hold their opinion, and to press it upon the House, I do ask the Committee to consider what would be the result of adopting it. What would be the position then of these loyal colonists, whose desires you would have rejected? Might you not then be accused of having "flouted" them? You would be doing that, and at the same time you would be doing worse than that, you would be discouraging all your loyal subjects in South Africa. The hon. and learned Gentleman in the concluding words of his speech reverted to the rôle of prophet, which is always a favourite one on occasions like this. It is so easy to prophesy, and it is so impossible to say whether or not the prophecy will come true, and when the prophecy has been proved to be untrue then all the interest in the matter has disappeared. He might quote me in the same sense, because in the speech to which the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth referred I did no doubt say, four years ago, that a war in South Africa would create feeling which might take generations to allay. Well, that was a prophecy. I should like to say now that, with greater knowledge, I am more hopeful. I do not conceal from myself the terrible divisions among families, among peoples, among races, among religions, which exist at the present time in South Africa. But it seems to me that those who know most of the country are of opinion that hitherto those divisions have been based upon a misunderstanding on the part of the Boers of the English character and the English power, and that now that that misunderstanding has been removed by the war the probability is that after a short time they will settle down to a condition of things in which certainly they will not have anything to complain of. We have publicly declared it to be our desire and intention to give to them at the earliest possible moment self-government similar to that enjoyed by our own colonies. When hon. Members in this debate have spoken of disfranchisement and other punishments, and have said that, while the object of the war was to enfranchise the Uitlanders, the result of the war would be to disfranchise the Boers, they ignore the fact, which they know perfectly well, that while for a period, which I hope may be brief, it is absolutely necessary that the country should be governed with large military forces present in it, yet we regard that as only a temporary situation, and one which we hope will be altered at the earliest possible moment. I have been asked by my hon. friend to say something about the future. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Poplar urged delay. Well, I think delay has been a colonial policy for too many years. I do not entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. No doubt we must not proceed too hastily, and we shall have to proceed step by step. But there are some things which are very clear. The first thing is the announcement which has been made that the two States will be annexed to Her Majesty's dominions and political independence will be reserved to them in the future. Let me say that if you want authority for that you will find it in the writings and speeches of one of those men to whom all appeal in South Africa as a representative of judicial impartiality and moderation—I mean Mr. Rose-Innes. Mr. Rose-Innes has declared in the strongest terms that to give back to the Boers any kind of independence would be merely sowing the seeds of further trouble and inviting future difficulty. That is the first thing. It does not follow that the future government of the two States should be exactly the same, or that the grant of self-government which will ultimately be made to them should be made to both at the same time. It is possible that we might find that the Orange Free State would more rapidly be in a position safely to enjoy these privileges and liberties than the Transvaal. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition in a speech which he made in the country used, I think, an expression which rather surprised me. I am not quoting his words. I have not them in my mind, and he will no doubt tell me if I am wrong in interpreting them. Their meaning was to the effect that, in his opinion, there should be a military administration until such time as full self-government could be given, and that there should be no interval of Crown Colony government.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My idea was, and is, that as long as your military occupation of the country continues, of course the government of the country, which is not a regular government, will be in military hands, and in that sense a military government. But if you proceed from that to take a further step, and constitute a regular form of Crown Colony government, it appeared to me when I spoke, and it appears to me still, that you commit yourself to a definite kind of autocratic government which would be more difficult to get rid of, and which would rather indicate that you would expect it to be a long time before you got another form of government. I hope I have made myself clear.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think I correctly understood the right hon. Gentleman, though I did not represent him with so much fulness. Practically, I think, we are agreed as to his meaning. I wish to say that I take issue. It is not the intention of the Government to maintain indefinitely a military administration in the two conquered States. We hold that that would be one of the greatest mistakes that could possibly be made in view of our desire for an early and pacific settlement. We remember what happened when the Transvaal was annexed on the last occasion; we remember how difficulties were created by military administration; we believe that there are difficulties essential to military administration, and that without in any way implying blame to the military authorities. But the military authorities are not trained for the purposes of civil administration, and certainly, in our opinion, at the very earliest moment civil administration must be set up, and a civil administration as opposed to a military administration is what we call Crown Colony government. But the fact that we establish such a government with a view to make the condition of the country as easy as possible, to make as few breaks as possible with the past, is not to be taken as an indication that the government will last for long, or indeed as any indication whatever on the subject. The question of the length of such an administration must depend on many circumstances which we now cannot anticipate, but especially, of course, on the way in which the Boers take to the new government which we shall set up. I am advised by those who, as I say, are most intimate with the country that it is the most improbable thing in the world that anything like continuous guerilla warfare will be maintained, that it is not in the habits of the Boers at the present moment. It must be remembered that although we sometimes speak of what is going on now as guerilla warfare, yet they are operations conducted by very large bodies of troops, numbering in some cases as many as 8,000, and in all cases having a very substantial number of guns and all warlike appliances. That is not guerilla warfare. What is meant by guerilla warfare, as we understand it from our knowledge of the Peninsular War, in which the Duke of Wellington commanded, I am, at all events, informed and advised we have not probably to fear. In sitting down I can only say that, although I recognise the enormous difficulties of the task which has been imposed upon us, I am hopeful, I am sanguine, that we shall bring it to a successful conclusion if we have the clear, the undoubted support of the nation behind us. If we could have had the warm authoritative support of the Opposition in this House, that is what I would have been best pleased to have had; if we could have shown that there was absolutely no party in this country on the question, I firmly believe, as I am standing here, that the war would have been brought to a conclusion before now. I believe, and I have some evidence to justify it, that the hope of reaction has prolonged the war, just as in the earlier stages of the war the Boers were encouraged to greater efforts by the hope of intervention. There may be no ground for accusing anybody, but there is ground for wishing, in the interest of this country, that, at all events, we shall have substantially a unanimous House behind us, and substantially a unanimous people behind us, in the difficulties we have still to face.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): There was one portion of the speech of the Colonial Secretary with which I find myself in cordial agreement

—namely, that in which he declared that he could not conceive it possible for any honest man who conscientiously believes that the war is an unjust and unrighteous war to do otherwise than think that the annexation of the two Republics is wrong, and that their independence ought to be restored. As to the rest of the speech, I think it is one of the most extraordinary speeches I ever heard in this House. For my part, I rather admired it for what I would call its audacity. The right hon. Gentleman held up his hands in holy horror, and exclaimed that he could not imagine how anybody could regard his conduct with regard to South Africa with suspicion. He could not conceive how it was possible that his attitude should be so misconceived. "Suspicion!" he said. "On what basis of fact is this suspicion built?" Surely the right hon. Gentleman cannot have forgotten the Hawksley letters, the concealment of facts in the South African Committee. He cannot have forgotten the promotion of one of the men implicated in the raid — Sir Graham Bower — and the reinstatement of another of the conspirators — Mr. Newton. Indeed, the history of the last four or five years in South Africa is simply one record of facts, each and every one of them affording good, solid, substantial ground for suspecting the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman in everything that he does in South Africa. But there was another sentence which fell from him which was interesting as indicating one of the numerous changes of mind affected by the Colonial Secretary in the course of his brilliant career. Four or five years ago he considered that a war in South Africa would be a protracted war, a costly war, and would create endless bitterness and strife there; and he came to the conclusion that it would be an immoral proceeding. To-day, recanting these, amongst a good many other opinions formed in the course of his life, he declares that he has changed his mind, that he has had further knowledge since then. He has seen men who know the country. [HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!] That is perfectly true; but he had seen these men "who know the country," then, and it is rather curious that these men "who know the country" perfectly, thought that they could take Pretoria, the capital of the Transvaal, with 600 men! These were the men who had been living in the country all their lives, who were the sources of information to the Imperial Government, upon which information the Imperial Government based their whole policy. These were the men who knew enough about the country that they thought they could do with 600 amateur soldiers that which it has taken an army of 250,000 men eight or nine months to do. These were the men who informed the Imperial Government that President Kruger would climb down. Why, there are people in this country who have never seen South Africa who have shown greater knowledge about South Africa than these other men who have lived in it all their lives, but who were blinded by local and racial feeling, and who could not be trusted in a matter of this kind. That is the unfortunate part of the whole business. The right hon. Gentleman has been studying the question possibly, but from what I can see, his mind is biased by other considerations. Anybody who listened to his speech knows perfectly well that that speech had nothing whatever to do with South Africa. It was not a speech directed to South Africa, or having any connection with South Africa, and it was not intended to deal with the South African business. It was a speech intended purely for the hustings. It was an electioneering performance. I venture to say that there is no worse eye-glass than the ballot box; and it was through that glass that the right hon. Gentleman has been looking at all these facts. When he came to deal with disfranchisement, he misrepresented—I do not say that he did so wilfully—what was said by the late Under Secretary for the Colonies and my hon. and learned friend the Member for Dumfries Burghs. It was perfectly palpable what their proposition was. Their proposition was that disfranchisement may not be a severe form of penalty, but that it was the worst you can administer now. I would ask the supporters of the Government whether disfranchisement would ever have been thought of in this wholesale fashion had it not been that the parties in the Cape are so close, that the Dutch majority in the Cape Parliament is so small, that the disfranchisement of a few hundreds will transfer the domination from one party to the other? It is a purely political move, and that is what has vitiated the whole policy of the right hon. Gentleman. He is so essentially a political manager that he is always electioneering. He is a kind of political agent, and so permeated is he with that instinct that he has made up his mind that if this war cannot be a military success, at any rate he will make it an electioneering success. So in South Africa the right hon. Gentleman just manipulates the settlement in such a way that the Dutch Ministry shall be turned out and an English Ministry substituted. And in this country he is determined that this war should have one result—that is, a Chamberlain Ministry in the next Parliament. That is electioneering; it is not statesmanship; and it is not the way to settle the peace of South Africa. The worst of the whole business is that these are the considerations that have directed his entire policy, instead of considerations of statesmanship and conciliation which might have settled the whole thing without war. With the permission of the House, I should like for a moment—it is relevant to the motion for the reduction of the salary of the Colonial Secretary—to invite attention to the state of things which exists in South Africa, and contrast it with the position when the right hon. Gentleman came into office. In Cape Colony what was the state of things when he took office? It is true that they had an Englishman at the head of affairs. The right hon. Gentleman has just been denouncing the Afrikaner Bond practically as a treasonable conspiracy. He said, "I have evidence." There has been too much so-called evidence which is kept back. Why should the right hon. Gentleman be the sole depository of all these confidences? This is, after all, nominally a democratic country. What has become of the right hon. Gentleman's rooted policy of taking the people into his confidence? Here is evidence which, according to him, is sufficient to ground an indictment against the people of South Africa, and yet he withholds it from Parliament. I have looked carefully into the Blue-books, and so far from finding any evidence of a conspiracy I only find that Sir Alfred Milner has filled them with the shavings and sawdust of the South African League workshop—clippings from newspapers and society gossip in South Africa. As a serious bit of evidence, there is a conversation with a gentleman called Schreiner, seventeen years ago, at a dinner party. Gentlemen who reveal the confidences of a dinner party are the men on whose evidence you are going to indict a whole nation! This gentleman met a Mr. Wright at this dinner party. I have read the whole conversation, and Mr. Wright said nothing whatever to Mr. Schreiner about a conspiracy. But it was said that his countenance was stern with self-confidence, and that he wore a self-satisfied smile. Therefore that means that he wanted to expel the British flag from South Africa. If a self-satisfied smile and a countenance stern with self-confidence are sufficient to expel the British flag from South Africa, I cannot understand why there should be a Union Jack left within a hundred miles of Birmingham.* And that is the sort of evidence on which we are asked to believe in this great conspiracy in South Africa! But the right hon. Gentleman says—"This is true; it may not be in the Blue-books, but I have evidence of it. It is within my bosom." It is time, I think, that we should get all these facts before the British public. It is the same thing in regard to the Boer treatment of the natives. What were we told in July last? The right hon. Gentleman said—

"We had charges against the Boer Government in regard to their treatment of the natives, but we kept them back."

To return to my main argument. I was pointing out what was the state of things in South Africa when the right hon. Gentleman came into office. There was an English Prime Minister, supported by a Dutch majority. What was the policy of this Prime Minister who was in office with the help of the Afrikaner Bond? It is thus described by the right hon. Gentleman—

"Mr. Rhodes has told us here that it was his own view or idea to secure the union of the States in South Africa, leaving to the other States a Republican form of Government, but at the same time the whole to be under the British flag so far as foreign relations were concerned."

The right hon. Gentleman whose policy was this was Prime Minister of the Cape, kept in power by this treasonable conspiracy known as the Afrikaner Bond. His desire was to see a Confederation of the States of South Africa under the British flag. What was the attitude towards the Transvaal? Shortly before the right hon. Gentleman came into office, or shortly after, there was practically a quarrel between the Government of the Cape Colony and the Government of the Transvaal. The former was on the point of declaring war against the Transvaal, and were only waiting to get the consent of this country to do so. And that was the Government that was put in office with the support of the Dutch majority in Cape Colony. What is the position now? It has been described by the right hon. Gentleman himself. The very men who had supported Mr. Rhodes, and four English Prime Ministers in succession, are the people now indicted for rebellion, whose leaders are imprisoned or expatriated, and whom it is proposed we should deprive of the elementary rights of citizenship, because they cannot be entrusted with those rights so far as the British Empire is concerned. That is the change in the position in the Cape Colony; and the change in the Transvaal is quite as bad. In the Transvaal when the right hon. Gentleman came into office matters were progressing favourably, so far as reform was concerned. There was a strong Reform party in the Transvaal at that date. The head of the Liberal party came within 500 votes of being elected President. And it must not be forgotten that General Botha himself moved a resolution in the Volksraad in favour of reducing the period of qualification for the franchise to five years, and came within four votes of carrying it. [AN. HON. MEMBER: How many voted on each side?] There were ten for and fourteen against. That shows the progress the Reform party was making at that time. The Reform candidate for the Presidency came within 500 votes of being elected over President Kruger. Now all these men are endued with hostility to Great Britain. As for the Orange Free State, when the right hon. Gentleman came into office, it was perfectly friendly. Now it is so hostile that its forces are in the field against us, and you have been mean enough to wipe out the word "Free" from the very name of that Colony. When you come to the effect of your policy in South Africa upon the Empire at large, it is found to be most disastrous. We have been obliged to drop all those great proposals for domestic reform of which the right hon. Gentleman claimed to be the apostle. And when you come to consider how it has paralysed the power and arms of Great Britain abroad

the policy might very well be described in the phrase of the right hon. Gentleman himself as calamitous. One thing has struck me. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite are wont to congratulate themselves upon the fact that the European Powers have not offered to intervene. But has it never occurred to them to consider what is the reason why those European Powers which are hostile to us, who hate us, and are willing to strike a blow at the very existence of this Empire, have not intervened and have not talked of intervening? The only offer of mediation has come from the one Power in the world which is perfectly friendly to us—from that State the Government of which is so friendly to us that it has imperilled its existence owing to its sympathy with Great Britain. The reason is that the Powers that hate and dislike us do not want to stop the terrible exhaustion of our power going on in South Africa. There is nothing that suits them better. You have simply to look at China and get your answer there. What is happening there? We are the Power which has the greatest interest in China. Our trade with China is greater than the aggregate trade of all the other Powers; and formerly we were the foremost Power in settling Chinese affairs. But what is the position now? We have been reduced to the position of a third-rate Power in the settlement of the affairs of the Chinese Empire. [An HON. MEMBER: No.] I will give the hon. Member the facts. Russia and Japan have each got in China more troops than we have; therefore in that respect we are a third-rate Power. But not only that. Why is it that in order to protect our own Minister and our own people we have to appeal to an Oriental Power? Why is it that we have to appeal to a Buddhist Power to protect our own missionaries? It is because the whole reserves of the Empire have been pledged in this terrific struggle going on in South Africa. Let these two facts rest in the mind of our great Imperial statesmen who are so proud of the Empire. I venture to say that if the House of Commons, if the Cabinet, if the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary himself, had foreseen twelve months ago the condition into which this war would have brought us, they would not have rejected President Kruger's terms in August and September last. The right hon. Gentleman, in answering the speech of my hon. and learned friend, said that to talk of suffering was irrelevant. That is an extraordinary declaration to make. He said, "What is the loss of 8,000 men killed on the one side and 3,000 or 4,000 on the other; what is the maiming of 40,000 for life?—and that is only the beginning of it. All that is perfectly irrelevant!" Surely in a question of this kind the suffering undergone is more or less relevant. Does not the price you are to pay come in when you are considering whether you should go to war? At least the Prime Minister thought so. We had a perfectly good case for war against France in regard to Madagascar, but Lord Salisbury came to the conclusion that British trade in Madagascar was not worth the immense suffering and sacrifice of life that would be produced by a war with France. It was because the right hon. Gentleman did not foresee what would happen, because he was misled by his own prejudices and prepossessions and by the men "who know the country" that he went into this terrible war in South Africa. I would ask the Committee what is it we have gained by this war? Taking the facts as they are at the present moment I venture to say that as far as regards all the objects we set before ourselves when we entered into the war, we are worse off now than before it began. We entered into the war in order to establish equal rights between the white races in the Transvaal. That was the avowed, open, and declared object. How do we stand now, even according to the declaration of the Colonial Secretary? Equal rights! Not at all. The first thing is that you have got to conquer the territory, and that will take at least a year. And then there is to be a military occupation. Afterwards you will set up a Crown Colony, which is to last according to the behaviour of the Boers. But, taking the right hon. Gentleman's own previous declaration, this feud may last for generations. Does he believe that if he annexes these two Republics he will restore peace and amity in ten or fifteen years, so that you can trust them with self-government? And what does a Crown Colony mean? A Crown Colony does not mean giving votes to anybody. You cannot set up self-government in the Transvaal and enfranchise the Uitlanders alone. The right hon. Gentleman knows that perfectly well. He deprives everybody of votes, and governs that State by means of nominees of the Crown. We started the war in order to obtain the franchise for everybody, and we end it with the franchise for nobody. It is true that you establish a kind of equality between the white races there, but it is not equal rights, but equal wrongs. They are all to be deprived of the franchise. Now, what would have happened if there had been no war? President Kruger offered a seven years franchise, or a five years franchise on conditions—nine-tenths of which the right hon. Gentleman himself considered satisfactory. Supposing the Bill granting the seven years franchise had been unsatisfactory—although it is not for the right hon. Gentleman to assume that it would be; President Kruger offered to refer it to an inquiry, as suggested by the right hon. Gentleman himself—assuming that it would have been unsatisfactory, it would not have lasted for ever. It is perfectly true that the reform leaders in the Transvaal were the men of real power in that country. Who were the leaders of reaction? President Kruger and Commandant Cronje—both old men. In the ordinary course of things they could not have lasted long. Their power was a diminishing and dwindling force in the Republic. Who were the leaders of the reform party? General Botha, the two Generals De Wet, and Lucas Meyer, and others—all men who have been brought to the front by this war. They are young men, and were pledged to reform and to granting the rights of citizenship to the Uitlanders, while the men who were pledged to reaction and denying the rights of citizenship to the Uitlanders were old men with diminishing influence. The young men pledged to free franchise were of growing influence in the State. All this means that if we had not gone into this wretched war, we would have had the franchise and equal rights in seven or ten years at the outside; and what would have been spared to humanity? Eight thousand and more of our own soldiers dead! And the worst of a war like this is, that it is not the guilty persons who are punished, but the innocent. I know not who is responsible for this war. President Kruger? It may be; but he is not the man to be punished. It may be the right hon. Gentleman himself—as I believe—but he is not the man to be punished for it.

Mr. Lloyd-George.

What had these 8,000 British troops who had been killed done? What had the 450,000 men, women, and children who have been turned out of their homes and are roaming over the veldt in the Transvaal done? Yes, or even these poor burghers in the field? They, at any rate, had profited nil by the corruption of President Kruger and his Hollander gang. That is the worst of it. If we had only waited with patience all would have come out well in five or ten years, and the suffering, the detestation, and the stain on the name of Great Britain would have been spared. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh!] Yes, all that would have been saved. And I will tell the Committee what more, in my opinion, would have been gained. We should have gained the confidence and loyalty of those men in Cape Colony. [Laughter.] Why should hon. Members laugh at the loyalty of 250,000 of their own fellow citizens of the Empire in South Africa, who never, until provoked by this war, had given the slightest indication of disloyalty, but supported the British Ministry? That is what we would have gained, but we made matters worse instead of improving them by this war. What else have we set ourselves to accomplish? The peace of South Africa. That is an argument I have heard in this House and outside it. It was said that the war was necessary in the interests of peace in South Africa, and that it would put an end to those causes of disturbance in the Transvaal. What have you gained so far as peace is concerned? The whole fighting prior to the war, and the whole disturbances, were purely local. There was no bloodshed in Cape Colony or Natal, or in the Transvaal or the Orange Free State—none after the Jameson raid on Johannesburg. Only a little disturbance which the police could settle. But what have you done by this war? You have covered South Africa with the blood of the bravest men which our own country and their country could provide. That is how peace in South Africa has been restored. But it is said that we want to establish the paramountcy of Great Britain. That was unnecessary. There are two things which I think the Committee ought to take into account in this respect. President Kruger did two things which showed that, however he might object to the name of suzerainty, he recognised the paramountcy of this country. First of all, he discussed his own internal affairs, and the very Bills which he submitted to his own Parliament, with the Imperial High Commissioner. What country in the world would have done that? Would Switzerland have discussed its own Bills regarding internal reforms with this country? Certainly not. Another thing he agreed to, and that was that in the matter of arbitration between this country and the Transvaal he was perfectly willing that no outsider should be introduced. Is that not a recognition of the paramountcy, real and effective paramountcy, of Great Britain? The right hon. Gentleman was not satisfied until he could get not merely the reality but the shadow of paramountcy, and he has got it. But, again, it was said that this war was entered into to re-establish British prestige, which had suffered at Majuba. The Prime Minister has declared that we entered into this war to revenge the humiliation of Majuba, and to restore the proper credit of this country. I ask hon. Members, will they venture to say that this war has re-established British prestige in South Africa or elsewhere? A force of 250,000 of the picked and trained men, not only of this country, but of the colonies, is required to crush 35,000 peasants. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh!] Well, I am taking as my authority Mr. Cecil Rhodes. At the present moment I do not believe that anyone would even assert that there are more than 20,000 Boers in the field. How does that re-establish our prestige or revenge Majuba? It is with regret that I speak of it; there is a sense of humiliation in it. My own countrymen have been captured, and who can think of that without a sense of shame? But in this war during the last ten months we have been beaten in battles in which the loss was greater than all the men engaged on both sides at Majuba. Why, we have had a dozen Majubas. Revenging Majuba! You have overshadowed Majuba with the ghastlier tragedies of Magersfontein and Spion Kop. You may have destroyed the Conventions of 1881 and 1884; you may have wiped out the humiliation attached to the memory of Majuba, but you have substituted for it a proclamation which turned women and children in the depth of winter from their own homes into the African desert; and you call that restoring British prestige in South Africa. On the contrary, British prestige has suffered, and no one will deny that this great war has done nothing more than to multiply grief and poverty. As for our military reverses, it is not for me to dwell upon them; but, at any rate, there is in them no restoring of prestige. I remember perfectly well the great cry at the last General Election was "Support home industries," and the Government, and above all, the Minister who got his party into power on the prohibition of foreign brushes, is now engaged in the task of restoring British prestige with guns made in Germany, soldiers fed on French vegetables and South American meat, Hungarian horses provided with American saddles, and foreign fodder carried by Spanish mules. That is how we are restoring British prestige and the credit of the country. The fact is that this war was based on a gross miscalculation—upon a series of miscalculations. It was calculated that with 47,000 men we could conquer these two Republics. It is rather unfortunate to consider what that miscalculation was based upon. It was not a miscalculation of the Intelligence Department. It was not that we were taken by surprise by the military preparations of the Boers. The Under Secretary for War declared that they knew perfectly well at the War Office the number of men that the two Republics could turn out, the number of their guns, and the amount of ammunition they had; in fact, that they rather exaggerated the power of the Boers than otherwise. The miscalculation was a miscalculation of statesmanship—a miscalculation as to the character, disposition, ideals, and tenacity of the men with whom we had to deal. And that miscalculation must rest entirely on the shoulders of the right hon. Gentleman himself. He has led us into two blunders. The first was the war. But worse than the war is the change that has been effected in the purpose for which we are prosecuting the war. We went into the war for equal rights; we are prosecuting it for annexation. That is a most serious change in the tactics of the Government from any point of view. There may be something to be said for a war so long as it is entered upon for an unselfish purpose. The influence of a war must always be brutalising, at best; but still, if you enter upon it for an unselfish purpose there is something which almost consecrates the sacrifices, bloodshed, and suffering endured. But when you enter upon a war purely and simply for the purposes of plunder, I know of nothing which is more degrading to the country or more hideous in its effects on the mind and character of the people engaged in it. Anyone who looks at the illustrated papers must see the horrible presentments given of incidents which were formerly relegated to prints like the Police Gazette—details which I cannot give to the House without a gross breach of good taste. Incidents of that kind are not given for the purpose of producing any disgust in the minds of the people, but with every circumstance of indication that they are there to invoke admiration. And all these are circulated broadcast in every household throughout the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary in a speech quoted by the hon. Member for Cokermonth said that a war in order to impose internal reforms upon President Kruger would be an immoral war. If that be so, I ask the right hon. Gentleman or any of his friends to find an adjective sufficiently expressive of the character of a war entered upon for the purposes of annexation. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that we had no right to meddle in the affairs of the Transvaal, and that there was only one possible justification for it—that our motive was an unselfish one. We have thrown that justification away now. It is exactly as if you had entered into a man's house to protect the children, and started to steal his plate. You entered into these two Republics for philanthropic purposes, and remained to commit burglary. In changing the purpose of the war you have made a bad change. That is the impression you are creating abroad. Our critics say you are not going to war for equal rights and to establish fair play, but to get hold of the goldfields; and you have justified that criticism of our enemies by that change. But, worst of all, a change has been effected in the character of the war. Up to a certain point it was conducted with considerable chivalry, and, so far as war can be so conducted, with apparent good temper on both sides. A war of annexation, however, against a proud people must be a war of extermination, and that is unfortunately what it seems we are now committing ourselves to—burning homesteads and turning women and children out of their homes. The telegram received from Pretoria, and which had passed the military censor, stated that fact, and I do not think he would have let it come unless it was true. It is also confirmed from Lorenzo Marques by information that 600 women and children have been turned out and sent to the hills. There has been the burning of the homesteads of the rebels, and this war will brutalise the people, and the savagery which must necessarily follow will stain the name of this country. It seems to me that in this war we have gradually followed the policy of Spain in Cuba. The action of the Spaniards in Cuba produced such a feeling in America that they could not tolerate it, and we know how that war degraded the name of Spain. This is the state of things into which the right hon. Gentleman has brought us. During nine or ten months warfare we have lost between 40,000 and 50,000 men, there has been enormous expense, and the end is not yet in sight. And this Government, the advent of which we were told would terrorise all other governments abroad, has been reduced to the necessity of appealing to Japan to protect its own Ministers in China. The right hon. Gentleman has made up his mind that this war shall produce electioneering capital to his own side. He is in a great hurry to go to the country before the facts are known. He wants to have the judgment of the people in the very height and excitement of the fever. He wants a verdict before the pleadings are closed and before "discovery" has been obtained. He does not want the documents to come, but he wants to have the judgment of the country upon censored news, suppressed despatches, and unpaid bills. The right hon. Gentleman may not be a statesman, but he is an expert electioneerer, and in his desire to go to the country before the country realises what the war means he is the one man who pronounces the deepest condemnation upon his own proceedings.

Mr. EVELYN CECIL (Hertford):* I have been very much struck with the extreme poverty of the arguments used by hon. Members opposite in regard to the past, and the extreme timidity with which they have touched questions about the future. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has given us one of his eloquent and bitter speeches, but it does not take us very much further. He has told us that the Colonial Secretary is really electioneering. I do not know whether his own speech was intended also as an electioneering speech, but I have my doubts as to whether it will be very highly appreciated as such. He has used arguments to try and show that in China we have been reduced to a third-rate Power in consequence of this war in South Africa. The sophistical nature of this argument is apparent. He has also told us that President Kruger admitted the paramountcy of Great Britain. Was the hon. Member bearing in mind that several of the leaders of the Boers claimed that the Transvaal was a sovereign international State, and that Mr. Reitz deliberately used this phrase in his despatch of May 9, 1899? He also stated that the war was not unselfish, but that we had simply been watching for an opportunity to acquire the gold mines. Everybody knows perfectly well the imperial system of colonial Governments, and as soon as we can in this case, as in others, we intend to grant responsible governments to the colonies, and therefore it is the colonies and the local territory that will really reap the benefit which is to be obtained by the taking over of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. We have had a speech from the hon. Member for Poplar. That speech did not add very much to the practical solution for the future, and his arguments were chiefly to assert that we went to war to obtain the franchise for the Uitlanders, and the result of the war was to disfranchise the Boers. The answer to this he supplied himself, for not very long afterwards he stated that the war has lasted so long that it has made the whole position a very different one. Of course war always alters the situation, and you cannot expect that the conditions will be precisely the same after the war as they are before, and it is idle to draw arguments of that description from the circumstances that have arisen. The hon. Member has also told us that Her Majesty's Government by their want of preparation for this war have practically made these men rebels. This, again, is an extraordinary statement which shows the nature of the speeches to which we have been listening. The hon. Member last year told us that our preparations were too many, too extensive, and too great, and it is almost childish now to turn round and assert that it is want of preparation that has made these men rebels. Even if the Government had made more preparation I suppose it can hardly be denied that their feelings would have been just the same. I will now come to a more practical consideration of the South African problem. We have to consider the question of the future government of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. It has been suggested that there are two immediate courses, either that we should rule the two Republics like a Crown colony, or else place them under military government. I venture to think that in the particular case of South Africa the two terms "Crown colony" and "military government" are practically synonymous. If you have a purely military government you will be subject to the same disadvantages as occurred in the Transvaal, in 1877, when Sir Owen Lanyon was at the head of the annexed administration, and if you are to have a really successful Crown Colony government it will require a military force behind it. It is also largely a question of the length of time for which this kind of government will be required. I think we are all agreed that after the war is over we must have a responsible government as soon as possible. I take issue here with the hon. Member for Poplar, the whole tone of whose speech was to urge that we were jerrymandering if we did not grant a responsible government at once. I deny in toto such an accusation, and those who are in favour of a responsible government being established at once should remember that there are many practical difficulties in the way of that course being adopted. How can you grant responsible government until, at any rate, the question of the indemnity tax is settled?—for otherwise you would be putting the regulation of the payment of that tax into the hands of those who have been openly fighting against us. It ought to be remembered, too, that you are incurring a very grave risk in this respect, for you may be sure that Dr. Leyds and his Hollanders will take the earliest opportunity as soon as a responsible government is restored of coming back to the country and agitating to produce the same condition of unrest and inequality again, and make the whole settlement impossible. That would be a fictitious agitation showing vindictiveness against the success of British arms, and against the freedom of British government, but it is only too likely to occur. These are matters which deserve serious consideration, and I have no doubt that, in spite of the jeers of hon. Gentlemen opposite, her Majesty's Government will take great care to successfully overcome the difficulty. No doubt there are other difficulties. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries has referred to the question of disarmament. Personally I do not see how any policy but that of disarmament can be adopted at the present time. We have had too many examples of the results of leniency during the present war to come to any other conclusion than that leniency must be tempered by judgment. I am anxious to be as lenient as possible, but when you have firing on the white flag, and Boers returning to their lost farms, and then going over to the enemy again and taking up arms afresh, notwithstanding that they had promised under parole not to do so, it is very doubtful whether there is very much sense of gratitude in the Boers. There is, of course, much to be said with regard to the attitude of the natives. We must bear in mind that it is only just and it is necessary also that the white man should be armed against any native attack. In consideration of this fact, it might be ultimately possible, having now partly reduced the number of rifles in the hands of the Boer population, still further to reduce the amount of ammunition they are given. I only only throw that out as a suggestion in view of the native difficulty. There is another difficulty in regard to the taxes in connection with the indemnity. I am confident that when there is a just administration it will be found that the illegal and irregular taxes and monopolies are sufficient when they have been removed to enable just taxes to be put in their place, which will, without offence, largely contribute to the indemnity. I refer, for example, more particularly to the tax which has hitherto been imposed by the Transvaal Government in connection with the dynamite monopoly with foodstuffs and the enormously high railway rates which have been charged by the Netherlands Railway. There is another aspect of the situation, and it is one which has been touched upon by my hon. friend the Member for Durham. We are all anxious to do the best we can for the future of the country. We are all anxious as soon as the war is over to show what British energy, and science and development can produce, for we know that it will bring real advantages to that unfortunate country.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Like the case of Ireland.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL: I have every hope that the Inter-Departmental Committee, which is to consider the question of the settlement of colonists and soldiers, will produce a scheme which will be of real benefit to the country. The climate is generally excellent in the Transvaal and Orange River Colony. More markets are needed and more skilled labour is wanted, as against the unskilled labour which is to be obtained from the natives. A greater development of railways is needed, without which you cannot bring the produce to the markets, and without which you will find produce grown without there being any convenient markets for it. You will be able to develop industries in new portions of the country. You will be able, I am certain, to grow more wheat in the Orange River Colony, which is a very good wheat-growing land, especially near Basutoland, where I am informed only about one-fifteenth of the wheat is grown that could be grown under proper management.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Give them a Board of Agriculture.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL: You will be able to develop fruit growing as well. One of the most noticeable things in times of peace in South Africa is that nearly everybody is supplied with tinned food. That shows that insufficient attention has been paid in the past to the possibilities of the country for growing the ordinary necessities of life. I have every confidence that the inquiries to be made by the Inter-Departmental Committee which has been promised will result in great good to South Africa. I have not mentioned such industries as the making of bricks.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Without straw.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL: The hon. Member is mistaken, for there is plenty of straw there. Brick-clay exists in many places. I also venture to think that this interruption is dictated by ignorance, because nearly all the buildings there are made of corrugated iron, which is extremely hot under a tropical sun. Really, I think many hon. Members opposite from Ireland are animated more by a desire to sneer at the policy of the Government than to listen to practical facts about South Africa. Gold, diamond, and coal mines are already worked, and my object has been to show that there are plenty of other industries which the colonists can undertake with advantage and profit. I know the difficulties are not small, and I do not wish to minimise them, but I am certain that they can be overcome. Difficulties arise in regard to the supply of water, but are largely remedied by storing rain-water in tanks, by sinking wells, by irrigation, where possible, from the rivers. By new scientific inoculation and other means we can get rid of many of the troublesome animals—

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Yes, the Boers.

MR. EVELYN CECIL: Such as locusts, which exist there. And various districts which have already been open to civilisation in South Africa show by experience that there is less malaria in those districts now than before. I have intervened in this debate partly because I wish to show that the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite were extremely unpractical, and were perhaps dictated by some feeling of electioneering anxiety, and partly because I believe that much practical good can be done to South Africa through the medium of British rule, and of the energy which has been hitherto wanting.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do not quite follow the argument of the hon. Member who has just sat down in favour of this war, but so far as I understand him, he is of the opinion that after we have spent £100,000,000 and lost thousands of the lives of our fellow countrymen, the inhabitants of the Transvaal in future will be able to live in houses made of bricks instead of iron. I can hardly think that that is a fair justification of the war. He also told us to draw our experience from Ireland. It appears that we have treated Ireland well and nobly, and yet the Irish Members are not grateful. Now we find that the Transvaalers are not grateful, and I should like to know why they should be grateful. Admitting that we are right in this war, is it likely that the Transvaalers would think so themselves? Can they be expected to be grateful to us for shooting them down, burning their houses, and dragging their women into the desert? We are told that we ought to pursue the war to the bitter end. My hon. friend behind me said the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary was rather addressed to England than to South Africa. I will go a step further and say that it struck me that the speech of the Colonial Secretary was rather addressed to his own side than to our side. We know that on the other side there are some hon. Gentlemen who are anxious for a speedy election, and there are others who are not so desirous. The right hon. Gentleman himself is in favour of a speedy election, and the gist of his speech seems to be that we ought to have an election at once if the Opposition dared to differ in one single word from the Government. The Government has a large majority and can vote down our opposition, and yet, although they can vote us down, if we dare to express an opinion that the Government is not entirely right in the settlement they suggest in regard to the future of South Africa, at once Parliament is to be dissolved and the Government is to appeal to the country on the subject. That is a new doctrine not known to any of the predecessors of the right hon. Gentleman. When Mr. Disraeli came home from Berlin with his "Peace with honour" he was urged to dissolve at once, but he had a great respect for the Parliament of England and the Constitution of the country, and he did not think it right and legitimate merely upon a snap dissolution to get a snap majority, and so he put the election off. It is perfectly true that when the election took place a little later he was defeated, but at any rate he had the satisfaction of knowing that he had behaved as an honest and honourable statesman. The right hon. Gentleman considers that anybody who votes in favour of the reduction moved by my hon. friend the Member for Cocker-mouth must agree with every single word which has been said by the mover. Did anybody ever hear of such a doctrine? This is the Colonial Office Vote, and a motion has been made to reduce the salary of the right hon. Gentleman by £100. Personally, the only hesitation I have in voting for this Amendment is that I am implying that I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to have £4,900. That is my own feeling, but I have got a dozen other reasons for voting for this Amendment. I think it is through the action of the right hon. Gentleman that we have this war at all, and I object to his interference with military commanders. But even if I admitted that the war is perfectly just I should have voted for this Amendment, because I am opposed to the action which the right hon. Gentleman intends to take in regard to the future settlement of South Africa. Then there is another extraordinary doctrine. The right hon. Gentleman said he considered it was a mean and despicable thing to do for anyone who did not vote either "aye" or "no" upon this question. I hope that every hon. Gentleman on this side will vote against the salary of the right hon. Gentleman. I am bound to say that the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman are singularly unfortunate, because I remember not long ago his action when the present Lord James, an eminent leader of the Liberal Unionist party, moved a resolution in regard to the Indian cotton duties. But where was the right hon. Gentleman when the Vote came on and the question was put? Everybody looked round for him, but he was not there. Certainly the right hon. Gentleman does not practise what he preaches. The right hon. Gentleman told us that there was a certain amount of suspicion felt in South Africa with regard to himself, and that it was not due to his own action, but was owing to the speeches of hon. Members on the Front Opposition Bench, who had absolutely told the people of South Africa that they ought to suspect him. I do not think there is anything ignoble about it if the late Attorney General did say that there was cause for suspicion. The facts are all there. We know perfectly well that the right hon. Gentleman went out of his way to laud up Mr. Rhodes, although at another time he practically stated that Mr. Rhodes was a most dishonourable man. Surely statements like those are enough to lead to some sort of suspicion on the part of the Afrikanders in South Africa. Surely there is still some ground for the belief that the right hon. Gentleman is taking some partisan interest in Mr. Rhodes. But this is not a question so much of the particular speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I am one of the great admirers of his eloquence from a rhetorical standpoint. The right hon. Gentleman always takes up two or three of the weakest arguments used, and he assumes that these are the only arguments, and then he proceeds to misconstrue them, he shrugs his shoulders, and when the hon. Member attacked gets up to put the right hon. Gentleman right he refuses to give way. The right hon. Gentleman's speech is a proof of the great rhetorical ability which he possesses, but it is more fitted to come from below the gangway than from a responsible Minister of the Crown. The real question is, what ought we to do now under the present circumstances? We know that a war has taken place, and we know that you cannot put things precisely in the same position as they were before the war. What we ought to devote ourselves entirely to is, what is the best thing to be done now in the permanent interests of South Africa and the Empire. I want to put an end to this racial feud which now exists, and which the right hon. Gentleman tells us existed for generations before the war took place. I should have thought that the war would have tended to increase this racial feud, and I was sorry the right hon. Gentleman did not state the reasons why he had altered his opinion. He said it was a prophecy, but I do not believe in the prophecies of the right hon. Gentleman either before or after the war; in fact, I do not believe in any prophecies whatsoever from anybody. What are we to do in regard to these two Republics and in regard to Cape Colony? We have had two Blue-books issued on this subject. The first book was full of newspaper cuttings, but the second book is interesting reading, because it shows the intentions and the views of the right hon. Gentleman, and what was passing in his mind, much more clearly than the speeches he has made in this House. The Cape Ministry did not ask the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman. My hon. friend said his opinion was asked by the Cape Ministry, but I cannot find anything in these Blue-books which said that anybody asked for the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman. I have read a long letter from Sir Alfred Milner in which the Cape

Mr. Labouchere.

Ministry represent to Her Majesty's Government their views in regard to the treatment of rebels. They say that they wish their views to be represented to the right hon. Gentleman, but they did not ask him what his views were. We know that his views were different to those of the Cape Ministry. The Cape Ministry proposed to indemnify all except the ringleaders, but the right hon. Gentleman was indignant at that, and he started a very curious doctrine. He said he objected to it because it was unjust to the loyalists. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that there should be a roving Commission to smell out the rebels and to get evidence against them, I presume from the loyalists, and this was to be the basis of the action brought against the rebels. It was proposed also that those rebels who had provided food for the Boers should be punished. For these offenders it was proposed that they should be punished by being deprived of their votes for the rest of their natural lives if they pleaded guilty. But if they did not plead guilty they might be punished in many ways as well. A sort of pressure is to be put upon these people. They are to go before a judicial Commission. If they plead guilty they will only be punished by their vote being taken away, but if they do not plead guilty they will be liable to many other additional penalties. It has been said that it would be almost impossible to try such men by a jury. And so you are to bully and tease these men into pleading guilty, on the understanding that if they do so they will have no punishment beyond being disfranchised. We are told that some 10,000 of these rebels took up arms against us. We will suppose that there are 10,000 who aided and abetted, and who will be brought under the purview of this law. The right hon. Gentleman has now given up the life disqualification, and he says they are to be disqualified for five years. We know what the object of this is, and it is a jerrymandering object. The real reason for this proposal has slipped out in the course of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. You have two parties—one of them was in power, and the other got in power at the last election, and they happen to have a majority in the country. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary wants to lay hold of about 20,000 of these persons to disfranchise them in order to put in power the other party. And who is the other party? Why, it is the right hon. Gentleman's own particular friend, Mr. Rhodes, who was defeated at the last general election by the votes of these persons. These men are to be disfranchised simply to put out of power those who have a majority at present, and in order to put in power those who are in a minority and who were defeated at the last general election. By the proposal of the right hon. gentleman the property of these 20,000 people is, in many cases, to be confiscated, and to whom is it to go? It is to go to indemnify the loyalists. When there are two parties in the Cape like this, the loyalists will be the people who administer justice, and if these loyalists know that the amount of money they are to receive by way of indemnity is to be exactly the amount they are to get from their political opponents, heaven help those political opponents. The right hon. Gentleman told us that a great many members of the Dutch community were loyal. Have we not always said so? I believe they were perfectly loyal. There were exceptions to the rule, but these loyal men have now to be put out of power—it is these loyal Dutch who are to be deprived of power. The Cape Ministers protested against the action of the right hon. Gentleman, and Mr. Schreiner proposed some sort of compromise. His party protested against his action, and Mr. Schreiner resigned, and he has now gone over bag and baggage to the enemy. Sir Gordon Sprigg has now been put into power, and he is a gentleman who was defeated at the last general election. And who is Sir Gordon Sprigg? He is simply the dummy of Mr. Rhodes. The right hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand anything about the game, and he does not understand the personal element in this question. The right hon. Gentleman told us that Mr. Rose-Innes is known for his impartiality; but he is known as a sort of Liberal Unionist who is ready to join one party one day and another party the next. Is Mr. Rose-Innes an impartial man? Why, anyone in South Africa would laugh at the suggestion, just as we would laugh at the notion of impartiality in some hon. Members of this House. Let the right hon. Gentleman and the Cape Ministry agree on some sort of amnesty. I cite the case of Canada.

Canada was on all fours with Cape Colony. There were two races, the French and the English. The French were anxious to join with the United States, and they confederated with certain leaders in the United States. What happened when the war was over? There was first a policy of revenge, confiscation, and disfranchisement proposed. But Lord Durham protested against it, and thanks to him an amnesty was declared. Some of the leaders were punished, but there was no general disfranchisement. What was the result? Canada is now one of the most loyal of our Colonies, and all friction between the two races has disappeared. Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the Cape Ministry that Canada is an analogous case? He will not, because he does not think, and never will think, that anything that is contrary to what he wishes can be analogous, or right or just. In some things I admire the right hon. Gentleman. He has a peculiar mind. He does know what he wants, and, unlike some other people, he takes the best steps he can to attain it. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman struggles to be impartial, but God has made him in such a way that it is absolutely impossible for him to be impartial. He must either be on one side or the other, and he is ready to do anything to attain the end he has in view. Very likely he thinks his own opinion is right, and he is right in standing by it; but what the right hon. Gentleman cannot understand is how any one can think that his opinion may be wrong, and he is perpetually jeering and sneering and abusing hon. Members on this side because we think that he may be in the wrong and not in the right. As regards rebellion, there is a good deal to be said for it on general principles. Who would now be called the greatest man in the history of the United States? Why, Washington. And who is known as the greatest man in England? Hampden. I remember the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh making a speech in which he complained of our unpatriotic conduct in thinking that there might be some excuse for rebellion. But I remember when we were discussing the Irish question that the right hon. and gallant Gentlemen gloried in the fact that if Home Rule were granted he would himself be a rebel. Some hon. Gentlemen opposite said that in that event they would "die in the last ditch," but the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was more practical. He said he would not die in the last ditch, but that he would kill all of us in it. As to the question whether a person is right or wrong in being a rebel, I cannot see that a rebel must necessarily be wrong, though I think it would have been better for these people in South Africa if they had kept quiet. They had, however, sons and brothers who were fighting on the Boer side, and it was natural and human that they should strongly sympathise with their own race. Moreover, they did not rebel in any part of the colony where the Republicans were unable to go. It was only where the Republicans had occupied a district that they broke into rebellion and joined them. But that was the fault of the Government in not defending the colonies. The Government thought that the war was to be a sort of cheerful picnic to Pretoria, and they sent out an insufficient number of men. The Boers invaded our territory, which they ought never to have been able to do if the Government had realised what the difficulties were. I put it that it is infinitely more the fault of the Government than of these individuals that they were forced into a position in which they had to choose between the actual forces in command of the district, forces which represented their own kith and kin, and the Government with which they had ceased to have any sympathy after what had taken place. For it must be remembered that the Government of Cape Colony proposed that the colony should remain neutral, and so far as I know there was no protest from the right hon. Gentleman as to that. It seemed to me that the right hon. Gentleman recognised the difficult position of the colony itself, and was perfectly agreeable that it should remain neutral. Under these circumstances, if England is at war, and it is understood that a colony is to remain neutral, the position of the people in that colony is undoubtedly very exceptional and difficult, and should be taken into consideration when all is over. I do not put it on high ground; I put it on the ground of mere expediency. You have never yet gained over a people by maintaining a policy of confiscation and disfranchisement after a civil war. I defy anyone to show where such a policy has ever succeeded. What we ought to do, apart from all questions as to whether the rebels were right in rebelling or not, is as soon as the rebellion is actually over to punish the ringleaders, and to grant a general amnesty to the people. How can you possibly suppose that you will get good feeling in South Africa when you have 20,000 men—equivalent to about one million here—who cannot vote, whose property has been confiscated, and who will see other people living on that property? You will never get by that policy the peace and harmony which we all desire in South Africa. We have not alluded to Sir Alfred Milner in this debate, though we have got a great deal from him in these Blue-books. It is curious that Sir A. Milner's despatches, whether sent by post or cable, always arrived in this country at a favourable moment to influence public opinion. We remember when his "helot" despatch arrived, though I could never understand why he should have telegraphed that rôle, except that it was to influence public opinion. Whenever a discussion is coming on in this House a despatch from Sir A. Milner backing up the policy of the Colonial Secretary is suddenly published. On 6th May Sir A. Milner wrote a despatch stating that at that time there was a conciliation party in South Africa. I should like to see a conciliation party in every country, composed of men who take a strong view, and who regard the interests of their country first. Sir A. Milner states that the term of conciliation party was a misnomer, because their policy was a direct negative to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, not a direct negative to the policy of the Cape Government, but a direct negative to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. Sir A. Milner thinks that it is practically a criminal thing that the inhabitants of Cape Colony should dare to express an opinion contrary to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, but such a doctrine would do away with all opposition in this country. If it were a crime to differ from Her Majesty's Government, a set of men would have only to get into office to remain in for the rest of their natural lives. As Lord Randolph Churchill stated, though perhaps he put it too broadly, it is the duty of an Opposition to oppose, and if they believe that the policy of the Government is a wrong policy they are only fulfilling their duty as members of this House in opposing it.

That Sir A. Milner should accuse these men of committing a crime because they opposed the policy of the right hon. Gentleman is really making the right hon. Gentleman a kind of dictator not only in this country, but throughout the whole Empire. Then Sir A. Milner goes on to say that the conciliation party was produced by politicians. How is any party produced in this country? It is not produced by the politicians or by their followers, but by politicians and followers together entertaining the same views. Sir A. Milner tells us in his despatch that for any exasperation of feeling that might result from the discussion of burning questions the conciliation party were to blame. Are they not to discuss burning questions? If the war is a burning question here, it is a far more burning question in South Africa, where it is a most vital question, and surely it is not a crime to discuss it as Sir A. Milner thinks. Here is an instance of the "impartiality" of Sir A. Milner, and I cannot help calling the attention of the House to it. Sir A. Milner may be a very excellent man; he may have many excellent qualities, but he is certainly not a man endowed with an impartial mind. Sir A. Milner complains that the language of the conciliation party was very strong, but he also admits that the language of what he calls the Loyalists was very strong as well. But he does not blame them. The Loyalists may use what language they like, but the other side are to be blamed if they use any strong language at all. Why should he protest against one side using strong language and not the other? I think all parties are united in believing that a policy of conciliation would be a desirable policy in South Africa, not only on grounds of fairness and justness, but also on the ground of expediency. Now, as to the Republics themselves, it is admitted that the Government of the Orange Free State was a most excellent Government, and it is admitted that President Steyn did his very best to prevent this war. [Some HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] That is the distressing part of this subject. I really do not believe that two hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have ever read the Blue-book. If they took the trouble to do so they would see that President Steyn has been praised again and again by Sir A. Milner and by the Colonial Secretary because he did his best to bring about an amicable arrangement and to prevent war with the Transvaal. He had a treaty with the Transvaal, and when the war broke out he was bound by that treaty. That is the position of President Steyn. Suddenly we have a proclamation announcing that the Orange Free State had been annexed to the Empire. We did not have any statement that that was done by Her Majesty's Government, and we were left to suppose that it was a military action by Lord Roberts. But we now see in these despatches that it was the right hon. Gentleman himself who directed Lord Roberts to annex the Orange Free State. For my part, I have always held that when we annex a country we ought not to do it by the action of the Executive, but ought to give Parliament an opportunity of expressing its views on the subject. We were not given any opportunity of expressing our opinion. We were not told that Her Majesty's Government had annexed the Free State, and whether that was right or wrong, I think it was very wrong for the right hon. Gentleman and the Government to prejudice the case as before Parliament. What would I do with the Orange Free State? I would give it back to the Free Staters, but I do not think there is the slightest probability of that. I have always observed that when we do lay hands on any territory, whether rightly or wrongly, the last thing we think of doing is to give it back. Therefore I will not urge that on the Government, because it would be a waste of time. But we have still to deal with the Transvaal, and the question is what shall we do with it. Why, surely it would be reasonable to submit to President Kruger some terms that he could possibly accept. The terms of the Government are absolute surrender; you tell him that he must give up his country, and that his country is to be annexed. If that were absolutely necessary for the safety of the Empire I could understand it, but does any hon. Gentleman opposite mean to tell me that if we were to take Johannesburg and leave the Transvaalers some sort of "reserve" as they call it in America, where their own flag might fly, where they might call themselves a Republic and live under their own habits and customs with every restriction as regards armaments—is it possible to conceive that that would be any danger to the Empire? I believe there would be no danger in it, and I believe that if we submitted such terms to the Transvaalers, though at first they might want more, they are in such a position now that they would accept them. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, if I am to judge by the newspapers, seem to put forward most extraordinary views as to what other people not English ought to do. They say that these Transvaalers ought to be very glad to become Englishmen because Englishmen enjoy the most excellent government possible, and a better government than the Transvaalers can enjoy in their own country. If we adopt that view we would be justified in annexing any country on the face of the globe. There are many countries worse governed than England, and if you say you will annex them because the people would be happier under British rule, you might annex the whole world. Never was such a doctrine known. Hon. Gentlemen must realise that whereas their love of England, in which we share, and their loyalty, in which we share, does them credit, at the same time even the inhabitants of a poor miserable country love their independence just as much as we love ours in this country. Love of country is not dependent on the country being rich or even being well governed. It is a natural and a noble sentiment, and if we crush it out in regard to the Transvaal, how can we protest against any species of annexation or against the crushing out of any nationality such as, by the Turks, in Armenia? I can understand after a war a country taking a province, as Germany did after the Franco-German war, but I do not know of any instance since the final partition of Poland of any independent nation being crushed absolutely out of existence in consequence of a successful war. We know perfectly well that the feeling of the whole world is against us. Even those countries which are friendly to us and admire us stand aghast at our professing this doctrine, and refusing to make peace until the Transvaalers have surrendered their nationality. We on this side are twitted with having no policy and with dealing in generalities. I am not dealing in generalities, and I have a policy of conciliation. If you will not give the Orange Free State back you will not, but I trust you will put an end to this war, and that you will allow these unfortunate Transvaalers to have some district in Africa where they can still call themselves a Republic. There are two other things we might also do with advantage. I honestly do not think that the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary is anything but a very able man, and if you want to have this country at war the right hon. Gentleman is the very best man to have at the head of affairs, but after the war is over and you want to adopt a policy of conciliation I can conceive no man less fitted to bring it about than the right hon. Gentleman. I would therefore suggest that the right hon. Gentleman would do well to devote his exceptional talents to some other department of the State, and that we should have a new man at the Colonial Office. I would also suggest that Sir Alfred Milner should be appointed governor somewhere else, and that we should send out to South Africa a statesman thoroughly independent and impartial, and tell him he is placed there to do his best for the Empire and to bring about good feeling in South Africa. I really believe you would do a great deal towards putting an end to the ill effects that must exist after this war if you would substitute for Sir A. Milner some other man. I am not suggesting that he should be a Liberal. Take one of your own men. There are plenty of men on your own side of the House, and plenty of eminent officials who might be sent out, and if you do this, and give the Transvaalers this "reserve," you will go very far in adopting a policy of conciliation, and removing the ill effects of the war, which must exist if you pursue a policy of confiscation; and what is more, you will go very far to putting an immediate end to the war.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN:
The most interesting and remarkable episode in this debate occurred at a time when there were not so very Members present—I think about two or three o'clock—and when the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies made an electioneering speech. It no doubt was quite foreign to the intention of the right hon. Gentleman, but it so happened that his observations, which were strong, took that form. In fact, that part of his speech might almost have been made by a member of a Government which thought that the patriotism of the country might be used for party purposes, if only the necessary stroke was given when the iron was hot, and who, not having obtained his way with his own colleagues, was trying whether he could do anything to raise a feeling in the House of Commons. It almost looked like that, but it was the speech of the Secretary of State for the Colonies in defending his own Vote—one of the most serious occasions of the year; and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would be the last man in the world to prostitute such an occasion for party purposes. What the right hon. Gentleman said was that the verdict of the country would shortly be taken, and that that required not only a knowledge of the policy of the Government but a knowledge of the views of the Opposition, and he implied that in this particular instance the views of the Opposition were not known. It is an odd thing, but I should have put it just the other way—namely, that the country does know the views of the Opposition and is not acquainted with the ultimate policy of Her Majesty's Government; and I think I can appeal for confirmation of that view to the fact that a few minutes afterwards in the course of his speech the right hon. Gentleman took exception to some statements that I made in the country as to the proper course to be pursued after the war was ended, statements connected with the possibility of Crown Colony government being applied, and he quoted my words and argued against the argument that I used, thereby showing that he was not altogether ignorant of the views that I, at all events, entertain. But the right hon. Gentleman went further, and proceeded to dictate to us what we mean. He did not leave us to our own interpretation, but put his interpretation upon it. I wonder by what authority he assumes the right to tell us what we mean. He said that anyone who voted with my hon. friend the Member for Cockermouth was declaring that the whole policy in South Africa was wrong, that the war was wrong, that it should be stopped, and that annexation was wrong. Well, I do not know on what possible ground the right hon. Gentleman includes all those points, which are disconnected with each other, in this one vote. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that everybody here was bound, if he was anything of a man at all, to vote either for it or against it, and that anyone—and I think he looked in my direction when he made this observation—who declined to vote on so serious a matter as he had considered it to be—no one else said it was—was really unworthy of consideration. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman should be so hard on those who occasionally refrain from voting in a great division. I remember an occasion when the right hon. Gentleman did not vote in a division, although he was the main agent, at any rate, in preparing the debate, on the Indian cotton duties. [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN dissented.] At the time for voting where was the right hon. Gentleman? It is not he, of all men in the House, who ought to speak lightly and unfeelingly of those whose conscience compels them to abstain from voting on either one side or the other. Therefore, I am not disposed at all to take the right hon. Gentleman either as the interpreter of my meaning or conduct or the judge of my action. We are in this position. Coming, as we have come to-day, to discuss, as I hope quietly, this most important matter, coming as I did, I confess, mainly for the purpose of obtaining information from the right hon. Gentleman as to things that are now going on in Cape Colony, of which the people of this country are almost entirely ignorant, of which even those of us who have endeavoured to inform ourselves remain considerably ignorant, we thought that this would be an opportunity at all events for ascertaining something from the right hon. Gentleman, who, as I said the other day, is responsible even on a higher plane, if not in so intense a degree, as the Ministers of Cape Colony for the civil rights of Her Majesty's subjects in that part of the world. But my hon. friend the Member for Cocker mouth has moved an Amendment. I will say at once that it occurs to me that my hon. friend takes a very strong view on the whole of this question. He goes to lengths in which I have never been able to accompany him; he has, I believe, again and again, if not always, voted against supplies for the war—that in itself shows how strong a view, how extreme a view, he takes of the war and all its circumstances. I do not agree with him in that extreme view; therefore, I cannot vote with my hon. friend, this being the mode he has adopted of bringing his opinions to book. I cannot vote with my hon. friend, and I will venture to tell him and those who are acting with him that I think they confuse the point considerably by raising a partial motion of this kind. I think that we should be better employed in seriously discussing the events that are happening than in endeavouring to pass a summary judgment in this way, which, as the right hon. Gentleman himself has shown, is capable of being misinterpreted even by so acute a discernor as he is. On the other hand, when I look to see what would be the position if I voted against my hon. friend, I am bound to say I should then apparently be expressing a degree of confidence in the right hon. Gentleman which I am very far from possessing, and in the policy to which from the first I have taken exception in the strongest manner. Therefore, if my hon. friends think it right to go to a division—I hope they will not, especially as it comes on an entirely unprepared House, and was not expected by anyone on this side—

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: There was full notice—three months.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Oh, notices on the Paper. There are always notices on the Paper to reduce the salary of every Secretary of State, but at any rate if my hon. friend goes to a division I shall follow the example of the right hon. Gentleman on the occasion to which I referred—to some extent, at all events—absent myself when the division is taken, and not record a vote on the question. I have said that I do not entertain the degree of confidence in the right hon. Gentleman's policy which would induce me to give a vote in his favour. If the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Gentlemen will cast their minds back to this week last year, I think they will be rather struck by the difference of the position in which we find ourselves. On that occasion—it was the last debate we had before separating for the holidays—the right hon. Gentleman made a most interesting and useful speech, in which he said that he hoped a reciprocal basis to the long controversy as to the franchise grievance was within sight. How completely all the provisions and calculations hat time and of some months follow—have been falsified ! It is the easiest thing in the world to be wise after the event, but the right hon. Gentlemen who are in control of the business of the country must be aware that they are expected to be wise before the event, and that it is harmless ignorance on our part to want of full performance of duty on theirs. What were the chief errors that they were indulging in this time last year ? In the first place, there was the expectation of a peaceful management. That failed. Then there was the idea that the Transvaal would maintain their case to the point of exhaustion. That was proved to be an entire error. Then there was the idea that a moderate increase of our forces would be sufficient. That was an entire miscalculation. And lastly, the last that I will name, there was the idea that the struggle would be sooner over, and that the submission of our enemies would be secured. On each one of these cardinal points the Government have been proved to have been altogether out in their reading of the probabilities of events in South Africa. It amounts to a lamentable and creditable misjudgment of the facts of the case. For a time the case for the Government was based on the revelation of the country of the great armaments of the Boers, and on the stories that were told about a conspiracy to drive the British into the sea. That only lasted a short time, however, because although the great armaments of the Boers were unknown to us, to those who had no official means of information, we find that they are known to the Government, who were acquainted with those great armaments. As to the conspiracy, no proof of it has ever been to this day adduced, and some of the extremest politicians in Cape Colony have disclaimed it. That is broadly what has happened since last year. I will put a plain question, and ask, if the consequences we have seen had been foreseen at the time : if we had known that all this effusion of life, suffering, and waste of money, not to speak of other evils that have been in the background, were to follow, were any man here who would not have made a great deal further than the right hon. Gentleman showed a disposition to go to in order to prevent an open rupture ? There is not such a man among us. And can any one say that the attainment of the ostensible object—namely, the remedy of the Transvaal grievances—was worth all it has cost ? No, Sir. That is, no doubt, a thing of the past, but it leads to the position in which we are now. The war is drawing near to a conclusion, slowly, but let us hope certainly, a war which has been from the outset a war of disenchantment. Two things only stand out of which we may well be proud—the constancy and patriotic spirit and equanimity under trial of the British people in this island and throughout the world, and also the bravery of our soldiers. But many of us have never looked upon the war itself, terrible as it is, as the principal calamity ; the principal mischief is the condition of things which the war will leave afterwards. I will not repeat for the hundredth time the very admirable sentence in which the right hon. Gentleman predicted the result of a war in South Africa. Someone spoke of it to-day as a hackneyed quotation, and it well deserves that character. As to the state of things after the war, I am not one of those, if there are any, who ever believed that after the war, such as it is, you could put back things as you found them. At the beginning of the session my right hon. friend the Member for East Fife laid down four objects which he thought ought to be kept in view for the end of the war : —(1) that there should be vindicated and established beyond controversy the supremacy of the Imperial power in South Africa ; (2) that we should make the recurrence of this catastrophe impossible ; (3) that there should be an equality of civil rights ; and (4) that there should be no ascendancy. In order to show how completely I agreed with my right hon. friend I repeated this formula on a subsequent occasion. Let us look to see how we stand, and whether we are in the way of attaining these objects. I direct special attention to the question of equality of civil rights and no ascendancy. Let us consider whether the events now proceeding in Cape Colony are going towards the equality of civil rights and no ascendancy. Are we sure that civil rights are being dealt with in such a way as to pacify the fears and give encouragement to all those, whether Dutch or British, who seek to revert to the quiet, peaceable, and harmonious conditions of life from which they were driven and disturbed by recent events ? After the war is over, as far as the subjugated States are concerned, I have already stated in an interruption that in my opinion the military occupation must be continued for some time; but that is not in itself an ideal system. I think that the attention of the people of this country should be drawn to the fact that the force to be maintained will be a great burden on the resources of this country, not only in money but in men, and on that ground this is not a matter that only affects the people of South Africa, but it also very closely affects the taxpayers and people of this country. But, leaving for a moment the two States, and coming to Cape Colony, the right hon. Gentleman is mixed up by the appeal made to him from the Cape in the settlement of this matter. The right hon. Gentleman cannot hold himself altogether aloof and irresponsible from all proceedings that have taken place under martial law. I am aware that martial law is administered by military officers, and that the reports on the subject may come to the War Office; but the proper view of martial law was laid down in 1867 in a circular emanating from the Colonial Office when the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was Colonial Minister, and which very clearly shows that it is not to be treated as an absolutely military matter. This circular said, among other things, that it was the plain duty of the Governor to secure that the officers commanded to enforce it should be alike supported and controlled, and that the Governor should issue written directions to the officers in command of troops, that even Her Majesty's Government could not evade the duty of framing standing orders and regulations. The circular also lays down what appears to me to be at variance with what we have heard. It states—

“The primary object of employing troops under martial law is not the punishment of offences, but the suppression of revolt. Martial law ought not to be enforced beyond the strict limits of the district in which it is proclaimed.”

Then it goes on to say that martial law should not be proclaimed over a wider district than the necessities of public safety require, and it should be withdrawn from the whole or part of the district at the earliest moment compatible with public safety. Those were sensible and wholesome regulations, but it appears that the Governor of the colony is responsible for seeing that they are enforced. In a self-governing colony those to whom the Governors are primarily responsible are the Parliament of the colony, and it is not a matter in which we can in one sense directly and in the first instance interfere. I am not making any assertion, because of that state of ignorance in which we have been kept—it may be necessary—that breaches of those regulations have been committed; but there are being circulated reports which do a great deal of mischief among the populations in South Africa, and which it would be well to have contradicted if they can be. This was the object of the many questions addressed to the right hon. Gentleman to which we have received no answer. What is the reason? It may be partly because of that system of censorship about which we shall hear more on Friday, and which has been applied far beyond the range of military facts and communications. In some instances it has gone to the extent of interfering with the expression of political opinion and the conveyance of public and political facts, just in the same way as would be done by the autocratic Government of Russia or the Sultan of Turkey. With regard to those who have been taken up under martial law, what is alleged is this, and I want some explicit answer. It is alleged that a man who is merely suspected of having been favourable to the invaders is looked upon as a rebel. He is apprehended, taken away from his farm and family, put in gaol without trial, not allowed to see a legal adviser or to communicate with his wife, not allowed to take part in any money transactions necessary for his farm; and this state of things goes on apparently indefinitely. I admit that I can give no substantial proof or sworn evidence of those facts having occurred, but there are so many cases reported in the newspapers that I cannot help thinking that some of them do happen. I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the circumstance, and what steps he has taken to prevent this horrible scandal being committed under the authority of Her Majesty and the free people of this country. If the people knew that these things were being done under their name they would, I believe, be filled with indignation. There is another side of this question, and that is the punishment to be inflicted. The right hon. Gentleman has been appealed to by the Cape Ministry to give his views of what ought to be done, but I will not enter on that now, as it has already been referred to. I cannot help saying that in many letters on this subject, even while repudiating anything like vindictiveness, there breathes a certain vindictive spirit in them all. It seems to be an exceedingly delicate duty for us to encourage and interfere on any considerable scale with the disfranchisement of persons in Cape Colony, seeing the great value we attach to those civil rights in this country, and seeing the narrow majority that exists in the Cape Parliament. It has been alleged—I merely mention the fact to be contradicted—I do not allege it—that the actual majority of the Cape Parliament being only half-a-dozen, the arrest of some of those six members under suspicion and put in gaol and not allowed to sit and vote, reduces the majority or turns it into a minority, though this majority will have as its first duty the passing of the Bill to disfranchise the rebels. If that was the result in any degree, I think it would be a most unfortunate circumstance. Then as to the disfranchisement of those who took part with the invaders under compulsion. Surely it is not intended by the right hon. Gentleman and his advisers that disfranchisement should be applied in any wholesale manner to them. I do not wish to put this disfranchisement question too high. If they are to be disfranchised for five years, at the end of the five years the effect of what is now done will be over; and if that is the effect just now, it will redound to the future strengthening of the party who support them.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The right hon. Gentleman seems to forget that this was the proposal of that party whom he says we are going to disfranchise. It was proposed by the Attorney General and Mr. Schreiner.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: But not agreed to by the other party. I do not know what influence was brought to bear in the matter, but there has been a feeling to this effect—"Let us accept this, bad as it is, because the alternative is the suspension of our rights altogether." If there was anything said or done which in the least degree should give occasion for that belief, I think it a most unfortunate circumstance. Why do I dwell on these things? In order to get information in the first place, and also because, if these things are done, the mischief occurs not only in relation to these things in themselves, but in the reflex effect of these things on the action of the whole Dutch population. You say there are things we have done or have not done that have tended to prolong this war—I do not suppose you mean the free granting of supply; we have never failed in that respect, at any rate; but it is not in that sense you mean prolongation of the war—but has there been anything in what we have said more likely to prolong the war than proceedings such as I have mentioned? Every burgher will see that this is the fate in reserve for him, and seeing this he will have the less disposition to yield; he will feel himself in the position of a man with his back to the wall, and therefore he will fight to the bitter end.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: What is the fate the right hon. Gentleman says the burgher will fear?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The fear of being treated with scant respect for his civil rights. They will naturally say—"If this is the boasted regard of Englishmen for civil rights, especially for Parliamentary rights, where shall we be, although they say if we only consent to give up our arms and surrender we shall become colonists and enjoy the full freedom of Englishmen?" That is, I think, a feeling most certainly not desirable to encourage. Therefore I shall be very glad indeed if the right hon. Gentleman can say anything on these points, apart from the question of punishment, and enable an authoritative contradiction to be given to the rumours that are current.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) and Mr. COURTNEY rose together, and there were cries for both right hon. Gentlemen.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will not stand between the Committee and the right hon. Gentleman for more than a few minutes, but I must say a word or two of comment upon the strange doctrine of constitutional freedom which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has just promulgated. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that at this time last year and for some months preceding that time we were all anxiously considering the refusal of votes to the Uitlander population of the Transvaal, but I do not remember that the right hon. Gentleman showed himself a protagonist in their cause or anxious to give them the valued liberty of which he now speaks. But when we come to depriving rebels in arms of the franchise for five years, then the right hon. Gentleman is shocked, and describes that as a fate so terrible, that it will not only keep discontent seething in the colony, but will keep the population permanently or for a long period in arms fighting against this country, whereas otherwise they might have been satisfied to accept the inevitable results of unsuccessful warfare. A more amazing doctrine I have never heard presented to this House. The right hon. Gentleman thinks it is an outrage that they should be deprived of the franchise for five years; but does he propose that they should go unpunished, or what alternative does he propose to what he describes as such a terrible fate?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Now, really I do not know why it is I am always so misinterpreted. It was in answer to a question from the right hon. Gentleman opposite who asked "What fate?" I said it was the prospect they apprehended that their civil rights would be dealt with in the way indicated by proceedings said to have taken place—not only disfranchisement, but the whole manner in which suspected persons had been treated, and the administration of the law.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: And culminating, I suppose, in five years disfranchisement. The right hon. Gentleman has quarrelled not so much with the whole procedure as with this most important part of the procedure, and what I think the extremely moderate punishment imposed upon persons who, without the slightest provocation and without any grievance which either they or their friends have ever stated, have deliberately chosen the moment of our difficulties to take up arms against this country. The right hon. Gentleman and others desire that these persons should go unpunished or that some different punishment should be awarded to them. Does he or does he not desire that they should go unpunished? Of course, I have not the right to cross-examine him before the House, or to interpret his silence as meaning assent, and I will not take unfair advantage of the fact that I am speaking and he has spoken; but if the right hon. Gentleman does not mean that these persons should go unpunished, then what punishment does he suggest as an alternative, what punishment more lenient, and which would inflict less suffering on them and their families, than that proposed? He would not, I presume, have the extreme penalty of the law inflicted upon them; he would not desire to see capital punishment inflicted, or that they should undergo imprisonment for life or for a long term of years. Nor, I suppose, would he desire to see any crushing fine imposed upon them. Under these circumstances I fail to see what resource is open to the Government of the Cape, with whom the responsibility rests—although, no doubt, responsibility rests also upon Her Majesty's Government in advising the Cape Government—I do not see what resource is open but to inflict the punishment determined upon, and my own frank opinion is that if the penalty errs at all it is on the side of leniency, not of harshness. I say that in no vindictive spirit, but simply because, seeing that the essence of the object of punishment is to prevent repetition of the offence, it is doubtful whether a punishment so light and so temporary will have the deterrent effect all punishments ought to have. I pass from the right hon. Gentleman's remarks on the policy to be pursued towards the rebels generally to his criticisms upon what has been done to two or three members of the Cape Parliament at the present time. His constitutional soul is shocked at the suggestion that two or three Members of that Parliament, about whose disloyalty I conceive there can be no moral doubt whatever [Hon. MEMBERS: "Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"]—no moral doubt whatever, I do not speak of the legal aspect of the case—are by the fact of their imprisonment deprived of the power of voting in the Cape Parliament, thereby upsetting the balance of power between the two parties there. The right hon. Gentleman seems to be deeply shocked at that; but may I remind him that the balance of parties in that Parliament is disturbed by another very different cause, upon which he has raised no protest. Some Members of that Parliament who do not share the views of those who are imprisoned are now fighting at the front, risking their lives in the defence of that Empire of which their country forms a part. Their party is deprived of their Parliamentary services, the balance of power is disturbed by their absence, and I should have thought that that, at all events, would have affected the right hon. Gentleman much more than the absence from their places of men who under any circumstances must be admitted to be under the darkest suspicion—to use the mildest language—as to their views and attitude towards the country to which they belong. I do not know that I need say more on the latter part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but I must say a word on the earlier part of that speech, when he was engaged in the—I think not uncongenial and certainly not unfamiliar—task of explaining to the Committee why he is not going to give a vote. But I really find it difficult to follow his reasons for that course. He criticised my right hon. friend for assuming that the issue raised by the Amendment now before the Committee was the general policy of the war and the annexation of the two Republics. Well, I think we have full justification for that assumption, for every single speaker who has addressed the Committee from the other side of the House and belongs to the right hon. Gentleman's party, has made the war the sole text of his speech, and directed his criticism to the policy of the war and of annexation. And another hon. Gentleman, who is a loyal supporter of the right hon. Gentleman, has risen more than once with a desire to emphasise the same views. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker-mouth, who is no longer in his place, the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries, the hon. Member for Northampton, the hon. Member for Carnarvon—all have taken precisely the same view of the issue before the Committee, and which to-morrow will be before the country as that which my right hon. friend has given expression to. I do not wish to enter into controversy with the hon. Gentleman opposite, whose speech in point of form was excellent, but in point of substance and matter it was a direct attack on the announcement which my right hon. friend made on behalf of the Government as the policy we are going to pursue. Let me remind the right hon. Gentleman that when my right hon. friend was repeating to the Committee what was the issue, and putting in the plainest language what it was that those who voted for the Amendment would be supporting, and what it was that those who voted with the Government would be supporting, he was cheered, loudly cheered, by the gentlemen sitting behind the right hon. Gentleman opposite and below the Gangway on the other side. They will not deny that. [HON MEMBERS: No, no.] I am sure they will not; their assent was expressed in the most emphatic inarticulate form. Therefore my right hon. friend was amply justified in thinking that the right hon. Gentleman is standing alone in imagining that the issue before us is something more than the powers of prophecy Her Majesty's Government may or may not have shown during the last twelve months. Then the right hon. Gentleman said, taking up a phrase of my right hon. friend, that the country does not know the policy of the Government, but does know the policy of the Opposition. Well, I thought that an amazing statement to make. It almost passes the limits—

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I used the observation as quoting a case in which I had been more explicit than the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I think the point upon which the right hon. Gentleman was more explicit than my right hon. friend was as to the exact form of provisional administration which should be adopted in the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. The right hon. Gentleman forgets that a very large fraction of his party do not wish any provisional form of government either in the Free State or in the Transvaal, and do not want these countries to be annexed. The right hon. Gentleman has a perfect right to speak for himself, and, I presume, for all the members of that bench, except the right hon. Gentleman who sits at the end of it (Mr. John Morley) and the hon. and learned Gentleman who sits next to him (Sir R. Reid).

SIR ROBERT REID: My right hon. friend the Member for Stirling is my Leader, and in my opinion the only Leader of the Liberal party.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That statement, made in the enthusiasm of passion, seems to me to be directed more against people who are not leaders than the distinguished Gentleman who is Leader; but I cannot congratulate the right hon. Gentleman as Leader upon the obedience of one of his principal followers. For, while the right hon. Gentleman will not vote for this Amendment, the hon. and learned Gentleman got up and concluded his admirable oration by saying that he felt bound by all that he held sacred and dear to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Poplar. That is a very curious course to take, in face of his passionate declaration of attachment to his Leader. But I have performed the only duty that is necessary in reference to the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech when I have reminded him and shown to the Committee that, when the right hon. Gentleman says he has got a clear and definite policy, that is not the policy of the party which he leads, and that whatever demerits there may be in the policy expressed by my right hon. friend, this merit it at all events has, that it commands the undoubted and loyal support of, I think, with the exception of my right hon. friend (Mr. Courtney), the whole of the Unionist party, and, I believe, the vast majority of the country. So important do I hold it that not the people of this country, or even the people of Europe alone, but our fellow-countrymen in South Africa, in this war, on one side or the other, should know that we speak with no uncertain voice in this matter, and are supported in no uncertain way by the country, that I earnestly trust, in spite of the defection of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney), the House will show quite clearly on which side its true opinion lies.

MR. COURTNEY: This is avowedly the last occasion this session, and, it is said by many, the last time in this Parliament, on which any issue can be taken on the colonial policy in South Africa of Her Majesty's Government. And although some, no doubt—perhaps a large majority of Members—may return to next Parliament to continue to take part in this discussion, that may not be given to every one of us, and those who have anything to say now had better take the opportunity, even at the penalty of being silenced for ever afterwards. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling Burghs commands my sympathy, approaching almost to commiseration. He is one of that class of men who are said to excite the pity of God—"a good man struggling with adversity"—and, in the position in which he is placed, I am not disposed to contest the propriety of the action which he, as the leader of a mixed party, proposes to take. It has been pointed out that members of the party behind him, quite apart from the obedience ordinarily paid to a leader, may in the present situation, without disrespect to him, exercise their own judgment as to what they will do. I at all events have no hesitation as to my vote and as to the meaning of my vote on this occasion. I shall certainly vote for the Amendment, because I look upon the Colonial Secretary as mainly responsible for the great error of this war, and also as mainly responsible for the great error of policy with which avowedly Her Majesty's Government appear to be about to crown the war. It is upon him the glory—if it be a glory—and the responsibility of this war rest; upon him, as Colonial Secretary, most of all rests the burden of meeting the House of Commons on the question of the policy which is to follow the war. And this is the occasion on which we are to express our opinion as to that policy. The Colonial Secretary, I frankly avow, has, in my judgment, misunderstood the problem in South Africa from the first. If that seems a bold and impudent assertion, I ask hon. Members to reflect on the position we were in twelve months ago. Can anyone who realises the position even then, and the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman then, and sees what has happened since—how the drama in South Africa has unfolded itself and the issues have been presented—can anyone resist the conclusion that he misunderstood it last year? He says he has changed his opinion on some things. It seems to me it is want of comprehension—it is an intellectual question as much as a moral one—of the elements of the problem in South Africa which prevented his forming a sound judgment last year, and which is preventing his forming a sound judgment now. Take the question of the treatment of “avowed rebels,” so called. The Leader of the House spoke of this question as involving the treatment of avowed rebels who had no extenuation to offer for the fact of open rebellion. Now look at the six classes of offenders. The last of all were those who were forced into the rebellion by a coercion which overpowered them, and the last but one dealt with those who, under the constraint of the invading forces of the enemy, furnished them with the supplies they wanted when commandeered. Can these two classes be spoken of as men in open rebellion without any extenuating circumstances? With respect to these two classes such language is extremely inappropriate. Here the charge against the Colonial Secretary is that he, not by direct veto, but practically, overpowered the spontaneous proposal of the Ministers of the Crown at the Cape. The Ministers of the Crown at the Cape knew the circumstances of the Cape, yet their policy with respect to the treatment of those different classes of persons was in effect declared to be unacceptable. The Colonial Secretary makes a statement in this connection which I find it hard to justify. He says the leader of the Government out there changed his opinion and deferred to the opinion at home. I can discover no statement justifying that assertion. It is quite true that, after receiving the expression of opinion from home, he communicated, in concert with the Attorney General, a modified proposal for the five years disfranchisement, but he never said he thought it was better than the first proposal. The Colonial Secretary in Downing Street thinks his own opinion wiser than that of the Ministers at the Cape on the spot as to how to deal with those rebels. Does the new Ministry at the Cape take up the position of the Colonial Secretary? I understand to-day from the Colonial Secretary that the Cape Minister has taken up a proposal for five years disfranchisement. That was not the proposal of the Colonial Secretary. His proposal was a disfranchisement for life, so we find him really more exacting even than Sir Gordon Sprigg and his colleagues in the present Government. I wish I could make the Members of this House understand in some degree what the position of these unfortunate rebels was on the border of Cape Colony. Cape Colony, in its interior, as is well known, is inhabited almost mainly by Dutch, whose families spread over into the adjacent Free State and still further afield into the Transvaal, establishing, in fact, a brotherhood between the society on the one side and the society on the other. These men when the war broke out were filled with a conviction that the war was an unjust one—that it was forced on the people of the Transvaal and the Free State by the action of our Government at home. It is not necessary at this moment to express an opinion upon that issue. But if these people felt that the war was an unjust one, forced upon those immediately over the frontier by the action of the Government at home, and knew that among those called upon and forced to fight on the other side were their brothers, their nephews, and their cousins, all the male representatives in every degree, is it to be wondered at that they should be overpowered by the sense of brotherhood, and in some cases should have carried their indignation against what they considered to be the provocative action of the Government at home to the length of joining the insurgents? But the majority did not join, they remained quiet. When they gave in they were treated as people in occupation of the country under the control of the new Government, and they were bound to obey the de facto Government in all lawful things, but they were not, of course, bound to bear arms against their own country; and because they, being in this position, gave supplies to the enemy, they are to be treated in the fashion described. To treat these men with undue severity is to create a standing sore upon the border itself, and to inflame the minds of the loyal Dutch in the rest of Cape Colony. It is because the right hon. Gentleman has shown that failure of understanding, that want of sympathy, I am afraid it is, which prevents his realising the actual conditions of life in the country with which he has to deal, that he has fallen into error. He spoke of the loyal Dutch. What he meant by the loyal Dutch was the Dutch who approved of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, as if a man could not be a loyal Dutchman who disapproved of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. Can a man be a loyal Englishman who disapproves of the policy of Her Majesty's Government? Is that impossible? Am I disloyal because I disapprove of the policy of Her Majesty's Government? It is said that I am unpatriotic. I think the tests of patriotism will survive these judgments. The notion that loyalty means support of Her Majesty's Government is one of those things I am not surprised at in the right hon. and gallant Gentleman below me, because it is entirely consistent with the past policy of the Government of Ireland, but it is not in the least compatible with the idea of the freedom of the citizen in a free country. The Dutchmen who are opposed to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and are yet loyal, are numbered by tens of thousands, and you are alienating them—the most precious part of your colony, the part without whom you cannot go on and continue your present government—you are alienating them by the policy you pursue. What is the significant language of Lord James of Hereford? Speaking of the future, and describing what many of us hoped would have come about—and might have come about but for the wretched experience of recent years—the establishment of one union of States throughout South Africa, he said that the loyal must be supported in their predominance over the disloyal, and, if necessary, the Constitution must be suspended in order to carry out that. That is to say that the Constitution of Cape Colony, in order to allow the supporters of Her Majesty's Government in Cape Colony to lord it over those who are not supporters, must be suspended. The prospect in Cape Colony itself is one of the darkest. If we carry on our view from there to the Free State and the Transvaal, what is the prospect you have before you there—with your annexation and your consequent action? Among other things with which I charge the Colonial Secretary, I say that he has brought upon us a war which has not only won us no glory, but has brought us great shame. It may be quite true that the consideration of the cost of the war has no logical connection with its policy. We may well qualify our judgment of the policy of this war when we remember what its history has been and what kind of credit it has brought to our military glory. I see that Mr. Winston Churchill seems to have inherited that courage which distinguished his father, and without which there can be no perception and no statement of truth. He says that now that he has come back, having once said that one Boer was equal, in the conditions of fighting in South Africa, to four Englishman or four Englishmen and a fraction, he is now disposed to say that he understated the case, and that he is more than equal to four, five, or even six. Now I will pass on to the future and the annexation. We are to have military occupation of these States when they are captured—when they are subdued—followed after a short interval by the institution of a Crown colony. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs in preferring that the military occupation should be kept up without a transition stage. A military occupation is essentially and in the nature of things a provisional arrangement, and consequently forces itself on your judgment for revision and improvement, whereas if you establish a Crown colony you may have that form for many more years than you calculated. Let your military organisation remain until you find, if you ever do find, the opportunity of giving free institutions to the States. Then what is the prospect? We look back to 1877–1880. In 1877 the Transvaal was annexed in peace, without armed conflict, with the consent of the then President, and with the consent of many others, and yet at the end of three years we had to restore it after war. Among those concerned in the government of the Transvaal besides Sir Owen Lanyon was Sir Bartle Frere, the High Commissioner, who was the equal in experience, and perhaps in force of mind, to Sir Alfred Milner. Lord Wolseley was concerned in the government of the Transvaal, and Sir George Colley had something to do with the government. When I compare these men with Sir Alfred Milner and the officers who have been acting under Lord Roberts, and from whom it may be presumed that the military commissioners will be chosen for administering the annexed States, I do not see what guarantee we have that we shall not go through the same experience in the future as we have done in the past.

Mr. Courtney.

You cannot give these two communities the franchise as long as you are exacting the tribute and imposing the taxes necessary to pay the war indemnity, because you could not get them to agree to it. As to getting a united peaceable South Africa such as you have got in Australia, such as you have got in Canada, by these methods, you cannot do it. It might have been got in the other way. It may be asked, what is the alternative? I admit it is a very serious question. You cannot put back things. The right hon. Gentleman says you cannot put back things at the end of an experience such as we have been going through exactly as they were before. I admit it. My hon. friend the Member for Durham made an able and considerate speech in the early part of the afternoon, in which he dwelt on the unwisdom of not facing the facts. I agree that it would be unwise not to face the facts in relation to the Transvaal; but what is the difficulty which prevents the reconstruction of these states with a greater or less degree of freedom, involving disarmament, involving, it may be, a partial reorganisation of the Rand, but leaving on the whole a substantially free Government to the Free State, and to the pastoral portion, at least, of the Transvaal? Could you not do it by the presence of a Resident who would have authority such as you have seen exercised in an Indian State? What is the difficulty? Is the difficulty in South Africa, or is it here? What is the difficulty that prevents our accepting and aiming at that solution? I do not say that in the circumstances it is certain to succeed. A man would be rash and foolish after this year of warfare to speak of anything as being certain to succeed. You will have need of the best head and the best heart you can send out to South Africa to grapple with the problems before you. But the difficulty is not there. I do not know how many Members of this House read the draft letter from President Kruger which appeared in the last Blue-book but one. Let anyone in the House or the country who has not read that letter read it. The difficulty is not in South Africa; if we had the temper at home that was shown there, the solution would be easy. It is a question of temper, not a question of facts which cannot be dealt with, with which you have to deal. Is the colonial policy of this nation towards the States and colonies all over the world to be settled for ever with the issue of the coming election? No, Sir. The inevitability of annexation does not arise from annexation being just or right. Men who admit that annexation is wrong still say it is inevitable, because the British people are determined upon it. But it is a patriot's part, when he sees a policy being adopted which he thinks is wrong now and full of injury for the future, to say so, and try to alter the temper of the British people. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh, but the temper of the British people altered in the late seventies and the early eighties, and the temper of the British people will, if I mistake not, be transformed during the years of the next Parliament. We are not going to settle this South African business by the action we are taking to-day. To quote that often-quoted speech of the Colonial Secretary, it will rest with you with its rankling injuries for years. That story will come home from South Africa, and during the next Parliament the Front Opposition Bench will continually be educated in that story. They will learn what it means, they will discover its significance, and their friends in the country, and even the newspapers, after a time, will learn some scintilla of the elements of the problem of which at present they are entirely ignorant. I have only one other observation to make. This is the first time in the history of the dealings with troubles of this kind that we have had the spectacle of rulers less wise than those who are ruled. Often before there have been rebellions, domestic troubles, insurrections, disasters, and, after a period more or less prolonged, things have been put right and the presiding ruler, when they have been put right, has had to recognise that unless you get a certain agreement in mind and temper among the bulk of those ruled you cannot go on, however favourable may be the initial moment of your resuming power. So they have always been, in the past, extremely chary of punishing, and have been most reluctant to put a penalty upon those whom they have subdued. In the great American revolution we know that President Johnson was wiser than those around him, and escaped by only one vote being impeached for a policy which every-one now recognises was right. There is a phrase which has passed into politics, which in this case is significant. One has read in history of persons plus royalistes que le roi. That King was Louis XVIII., of whom it is said that he never learnt anything and never forgot anything. But he was wiser than his Royalists, for these proscriptions he would not sanction. When I recall what has happened in Cape Colony, and see that the policy of the Colonial Secretary is not only more severe than that of Mr. Schreiner, but also of Sir Gordon Sprigg, I think I can say with justice, plus royaliste que le roi.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): I trust the House will, for a short time, give me its indulgence, and I will endeavour to confine myself as much as possible to a statement of opinion rather than of argument. I do so the more easily because I had not intended to take any part in the debate. But the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries and the Leader of the Government have both made speeches which render it necessary that some personal explanation should be given. I cannot give to the statement of my own individual position that same force and form which my hon. and learned friend has given to his statement of opinion, but I shall try to do it with the same loyalty and consideration for the leader whom we are both anxious to follow. I am going to take a course which differs from the Leader of the Opposition. I am going to vote against the Amendment. I wish to say that, with the respect I have for him personally, I desire to be in agreement with him, and I differ from him with reluctance. But, at the same time, I feel that as my right hon. friend is not going to vote for the Amendment, it gives, and must necessarily give, a certain liberty of action to those among his followers who hold strong opinions to take their own course. No one can doubt, after taking note of the quarter from which the Amendment comes, what it means. What it does and must always mean can only be gathered from those who supported it, and if anything were wanted to clinch what it means it is the eloquent speech of the right hon. Member for Bodmin, who never intervenes in debate without raising the tone of debate and expressing his views with eloquence. He has stated distinctly that this Amendment raises the whole question of the merits of the war. I prefer to say "the merits" rather than the policy of the war, because I do not think there was any war policy in this country whatever. The strongest point against the Government is that they were taken by surprise and had not made enough preparation. The preparation was on the other side. The policy was on the other side. The policy was Mr. Kruger's, pursued, as I believe after what has come to light, for a long course of years. The want of policy was at home. The Government, or rather some members of it, make it difficult for us to support them, because they endeavour to say that if we support them with regard to the merits of the war, if we do not hold them responsible for having brought about the war, we are bound to refrain from criticism of mistakes which have been made in the conduct of the war. That is the only construction I can put on the extract from the speech of Lord James of Hereford the other day which my hon. and learned friend has quoted. If that was not what Lord James intended, I do not know what he did mean. I say frankly that we do not consider that by this Vote we are bound to abstain from criticisms of mistakes or of the whole question of who was responsible for the "unhappy entanglement at Ladysmith," for the want of preparation, and what seems to us apparent, the want of a guiding, directing spirit co-ordinating the policy of the Cabinet as a whole. Upon such points we cannot keep silence, and it must not be understood that we are going to keep silence upon them. I make that guarded statement because I gather it is designed to put a certain construction upon this vote. The construction I put upon the vote is this: As far as this vote is concerned, it does not deal with the general merits of the war, but it deals with what has been disclosed in the Papers last presented to Parliament—the punishment of the rebels. Lord James of Hereford appears to have made a speech going far beyond anything which appears in the Blue-book, but it is not his speech that we are discussing. The actual proposals in the Blue-book are quite definite. To attempt to maintain disfranchisement in perpetuity might land you in the position of having a Government the nominal representative of the country, but really representative of the minority, and that would be certain to produce demoralisation of the Government in the long run, and perpetuate exasperation in the country. But when it comes to a question of five years disfranchisement and the other penalties which are proposed in the Blue-book, I cannot say that the penalties are excessive. Clemencies in the past were directed against wholesale executions and irreparable penalties which, once enforced, could never be undone. There is no irreparable penalty proposed here, and there is nothing that cannot be easily removed in the future. Taking the proposals as they stand, I do not think they are excessive. We must bear in mind that the loyalists have also to be considered. We have as yet made no reparation to them, and we are not in a position to do so. Starting, then, from the point that no irreparable penalties are proposed, I think that it will be sufficient that we should accept this as reasonable for the moment, but bear in mind that, if we wish to be more lenient in the future, that will be more effective on the whole state of public opinion in South Africa when we have made some reparation to the loyalists. So much on that particular point. Now, Sir, with regard to the merits of the war. I am really bound by the opinions which I have expressed in the country and the vote I gave last October to vote against the Amendment. This Amendment is in substance the same Amendment. What I think is important is that the Government should have a clear understanding, and that it should be known how far we are prepared to go in giving them support in the future. When we stated at the beginning of the session that we should support the Government in carrying on the war, the Leader of the House said the value of that depended on how far we would go. For myself I support them to the end of the war, and in proclaiming annexation afterwards. If you do not have annexation—if you do not have a clear issue with regard to annexation—you will have again Conventions, and you will have again that weary treadmill of which we have had experience, and the whole country kept in a state of unrest. Although I am anxious that we should advocate what we think necessary, reasonable, moderate, and in a fair temper, we must remember how far the lessons of the past show that the earnest and conciliatory temper as expressed by the Member for Bodmin runs the risk of being misunderstood in South Africa, and how it has been misunderstood. Let us be perfectly clear on the point of annexation. Annexation seems to me to be synonymous with the end of the war. When the war comes to an end annexation must follow, but we all feel that it is as easy to annex as it is to end the war. We can annex with a mere stroke of the pen. The Government have a right to ask as to the future what support they will have in making a settlement after the annexation has been accomplished. That is a matter which it is impossible to discuss before the end of the war. But, while I am entirely uncommitted with regard to the settlement, I feel, as I suppose everybody feels, that in the long run it is impossible for any large number of white men to be kept within the British Empire without representative Government. What should be the first steps, and how soon they should be taken, must depend upon the condition of affairs with which we have to deal after the war is over. We have had many prophecies, some pessimistic and some optimistic, as to the condition of affairs, but I would not take the opinion of anyone, however well he knows South Africa, as to what the condition of affairs will be, certainly not of persons who have been spending their time in this country while events have been in progress in South Africa. What we shall want is a long, careful, and exhaustive opinion from those in South Africa who have been through the war and who have held responsible positions and are really representative men. When the Government are in a position to give us that, we shall be in a position to discuss the question of settlement. I hope I have made my position clear on this Vote. Having stated, as I have, that, though I deplore the mistakes which have been made in the conduct of the war, and the want of preparation, I have believed throughout that this country has been in the right and that the war has been forced upon it. Under these circumstances I see no reason why I should not repeat the vote I gave last October.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I do not intend to detain the House, because I am anxious to bring this sitting to an end.

I had not intended either to speak or to vote upon this Amendment, but the speech just delivered by my hon. friend has made it absolutely necessary that some of us should say what we think of the position. To my mind this Amendment, which I treat entirely apart from the speeches which have been made in support of it, does not express any opinion as to what the settlement is to be after the war, but it is an expression of strong disapproval and distrust of the methods recently adopted by the Government, and in particular of the attitude of the Colonial Secretary. I will not argue now the merits of the war with my hon. friend beside me. It would be a thankless task to argue with him, but I will repeat what I have said before of this war, that I believe it to be a needless war, and one which leaves us worse off in South Africa as regards the future than we were before. Now, I desire to say a word or two as to what has arisen in the course of this debate. I agree with my hon. friend the Member for the Berwick Division—and I am afraid it is almost the only point on which I do agree with him in the speech he has made—that this is not the time to talk of a settlement, and if my hon. friend feels that it is too soon to ask for the plan of a settlement I think he would have been well advised if he had also abstained from expressing any opinion upon the question of annexation. Public opinion is far too excited, as well as too imperfectly informed, in England at the present time to enable us to deal properly with this question. The justification which I find for the submitting of this Amendment is because it is aimed at the present attitude and the recent policy of Her Majesty's Government. That is a policy which is permeated by a spirit which is utterly wrong and foolish. There was not a word in the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary tending to pacify public feeling in South Africa. The difficulties there are enormous. The difficulties of bringing about peace and good feeling there will tax the wisdom of statesmen for generations to come, and yet the right hon. Gentleman never said a word calculated to make those difficulties less. Whenever he delivers a speech, he makes them greater. When offers of peace were made to the Government, some months ago, those offers were met by a peremptory refusal which cut off all possibility of negotiations, and that decisive refusal has done much to prolong the war. The Government proclaimed the annexation of the Free State before it was necessary to do so, and when they told the Free State burghers and the Transvaal burghers that no better terms would be granted them if they desisted from fighting, they gave them every encouragement to fight on to the end. The right hon. Gentleman ignores the existence of the large mass of well-disposed and loyal Dutch people to whom we have to look in the future if we are to hope to retain Cape Colony in contentment. This is not a question of inflicting punishment on the ringleaders in the rebellion, but it is a question of disfranchising those who may not have done a single disloyal act in districts which the British troops were not protecting. These men ought not to be punished by lifelong disfranchisement, as the Colonial Secretary proposed, because it is plain that they acted under compulsion. I confess that I feel that there must be a punishment for the rebels, and I also feel that we cannot restore the republics to the same state in which they were in before the war. Both these things we must admit, but what I also feel is that there is a great need in a country like South Africa that words of peace should be spoken, that punishment should go no further than is absolutely necessary, and should have no vindictive character, and that when passion runs so high in South Africa there should come from England words to show that we were trying to look at things in a much calmer and wiser spirit, and words that would make for peace and conciliation. Like my hon. friend the Member for the Berwick Division, we all desire a united and peaceful South Africa, but the policy of the Government appears to be calculated to stir up and perpetuate strife between the white races in the presence of a vast black population, which the more it increases and the more it assimilates the arts of civilisation, will so much the more become a most formidable element in the country. In the face of these difficulties we have a right to expect that the Government should try to pour oil upon the troubled waters instead of aggravating the difficulties that exist, and making it harder to restore that peace which South Africa so sadly needs. Under these circumstances I feel bound to join in the condemnation of the recent policy of the Government, which is conveyed by the Amendment.

MR. LUTTRELL (Devonshire, Tavistock) rose to continue the debate, when—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

[THIRD READING.]

f the Day for the Third Reading

"That the Bill be now read time."—(Lord Henage.)

LORD CHANCELLOR (The HALSBURY) said he felt it his give their Lordships an opporprotesting against this Bill.
endeavoured to frame Amend-ich would render this a more Bill, but had come to the con-at there were great objections m of amendment. The whole nd object of the Bill was vicious.
n recommended to their Lordsideration on the ground that called the parties were agreed.
ied to him a very serious thing, the parties" were the shipowners side and the dock and harbour the other. This was a circumich ought to put them on their inst the Bill rather than tell in ; because they had these two erful bodies combining against c who owned goods and had and limbs to care for. More-Bill had not been brought before one of those bodies who were to look after the commercial of the country. If the Bill were l Parliament were thus to affirm the principle of limitation of liability, it would form an irresistible argument in favour of similar legislation for every railway company in the United Kingdom, who at present were liable to the very last farthing they possessed. Clause 3 of the Bill provided that—

"The limitation of liability under this Act shall relate to the whole of any losses and damages which may arise upon any one distinct occasion, although such losses and damages may be sustained by more than one person, and shall apply whether the liability arises at common law or under any general or private Act of Parliament, and notwithstanding anything contained in such Act."

The measure of liability proposed in the Bill was absurd and grotesque. He really did not know what relation the size of the largest ship which had used the dock or harbour within five years previous to the accident had to the liability of the dock or canal owners. He objected to the mode by which the Bill came to be in its present form. The shipowners wanted additional limits, whereupon the dock-owners said,
"We shall oppose you unless we get something too." The Bill was supposed to have received the patronage of the Government in the other House. As a matter of fact, the Attorney General had voted against it, and the President of the Board of Trade, with whom he (the Lord Chancellor) had thought it right to communicate, had informed him that he repudiated any responsibility for the measure, but that as he understood both parties were agreed he would not interfere. That was the extent to which his right hon. friend's support went. He begged to move that the Bill be read this day three months.

Amendment moved—

"To leave out 'now' and insert at the end of the motion, 'this day three months.'"—(The Lord Chancellor.)

EARL EGERTON pointed out that the two great commercial cities of Liverpool and Manchester agreed in supporting the Bill. Under the Bill as it stood, the liability of Liverpool would be £136,000, whereas by the first suggested Amendment of the Lord Chancellor it would be only £50,000, and by the second Amendment it would be £530,000.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: I have not moved those Amendments.

EARL EGERTON: No; but I am showing how difficult it is to frame any standard other than that in the Bill. In the case of Manchester the limit of the Bill was £104,000, which was reduced to £23,000 by the Lord Chancellor's first Amendment, an utterly inadequate amount; whilst by the second Amendment it would be £230,000, which was far too much. The Bill had been very fully considered by all the parties interested, and it was agreed that no difficulty whatever would be experienced in ascertaining the tonnage of the largest vessel using the port. He trusted that the Bill, which had received the unanimous support of the commercial community, would not be rejected in consequence of any precedent which the measure might form. The shipping interest was entirely different from the railway interest, and he hoped that their Lordships would agree to pass the Bill, which was the outcome of long negotiations between the parties interested.

LORD HENEAGE said he thought their Lordships would admit that the course taken by the noble and learned Lord was extremely inconvenient. The noble and learned Lord first put down an Amendment to Clause 2 proposing as the limit of the liability of the dock or canal or harbour authority 10 per centum of the value of the dock or canal or harbour. He had endeavoured to find out what would be the effect of that Amendment, and, having gone through an immense amount of figures, he had come to the conclusion that it was utterly absurd, ridiculous, and impracticable. The noble and learned Lord changed his mind and put down another Amendment proposing that the liability was not to exceed the value of the dock or canal or harbour. That, if not more absurd than the first, was more complicated and more impracticable. But instead of moving that Amendment, for which the House had come prepared, the noble and learned Lord moved the rejection of the Bill. However, that did not matter, for if the noble and learned Lord had moved his Amendment and had carried it the Bill could not have been accepted by its promoters. The noble and learned Lord dealt with life and property at sea; this Bill had nothing to do with that subject. It was with difficulty that he was able to hear the observations of the noble and learned Lord, but he understood him to say that he (Lord Heneage) had acknowledged that the bodies representing the commercial interests of the country had not been consulted in regard to this Bill. He acknowledged nothing of the kind. In reply to Lord Avebury, who asked, at a previous stage of the Bill, if those interested in cargoes had been consulted, he (Lord Heneage) stated that he could not recollect from memory whether chambers of commerce had been consulted, but that he was perfectly certain that underwriters had been, and that they approved of the Bill. Lord Avebury himself consulted the underwriters, and said he had no Amendment to move. The second clause was not so illogical as it looked, and there would not be the slightest difficulty in obtaining information with respect to the tonnage of the largest ship that had entered the dock, canal, or harbour. He would not ask their Lordships to take his word only for this, but would quote the opinion of one of the leading lawyers in the Admiralty Court. Mr. Butler Aspinall had expressed the following opinion—

"I am of opinion that the proposed basis of dock-owners' liability, namely, £8 per ton on the largest registered ship, is practicable and can be given effect to by the Admiralty Court without difficulty or undue expense. Dock-owners who propose limiting their liability will institute an action in the Admiralty Division for that purpose. Upon the action coming on for trial, the plaintiff will have to satisfy the judge by evidence that his alleged limit is based upon the tonnage of the largest ship. This can be done in accordance with the practice of the court by affidavit and the production of the ship's register. If the defendant deny that the ship in question is the largest ship, this issue of fact can be shortly and cheaply determined. In the large majority of cases there would be no dispute as to which was the largest ship. The basis of the largest ship seems fanciful, but in truth there is no principle in determining the quantum of a wrongdoer's liability, once it is granted that he is to be allowed to limit his liability. The proposed basis is capable of being easily worked, and this to my mind is its great merit.

"I think that the Lord Chancellor's proposal would lead in many cases to great delay and heavy expenditure. In many cases there would necessarily be an expensive inquiry into what the rateable value was. The Admiralty Court has no machinery for this purpose and no officials with the necessary special knowledge to enable them to hold such inquiries. It would mean that both parties would be entitled to be heard before the tribunal holding the inquiry, presumably with a right of appeal, which most conceivably might result in the matter not being disposed of till it had reached the House of Lords for adjudication."

The Lord Chancellor said something with reference to the patronage of the Board of Trade. He (Lord Heneage) had spent the greater part of his life in the House of Commons, and had always understood, when a Bill went through that House unanimously supported by every Cabinet Minister and by the Law Officers of the Crown, that the Department had made itself responsible for the Bill, because, if it was a bad Bill, they ought to have opposed it. Even in the House of Lords Lord Balfour of Burleigh stated distinctly that the Board of Trade was in favour of the Bill, and voted against the Amendment of Lord Alverstone which was moved in Committee. The Board of Trade had loyally stood by the Bill, and was at this moment of opinion that the solution in the Bill was the only possible solution of the difficulty. He trusted their Lordships would not reject the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said it was a scandalous thing that the spokesmen of the Government on this question should take up such varying attitudes. Notwithstanding this division of opinion, the Department really responsible had given its opinion in favour of the Bill. It seemed to him that when it was a matter of choosing between the opinion of the Board of Trade—the responsible Department—and that of any member of the Government, the best course to take was to follow the advice of the responsible Minister. The noble and learned Lord said they must be very careful in passing the Bill, because the two interests most concerned had come to an agreement. Surely one of the first considerations in matters of this kind was whether those in the country who were specially affected by the proposed law were in favour of it.

LORD ALVERSTONE asked their Lordships to consider whether the Bill was one which ought to pass, and not to put the responsibility upon any supposed agreement between shipowners and dock-owners, who were really making a bargain in their own interests without considering the interests of the persons who were really concerned. Not a single argument had been brought forward in their Lordships' House to justify the extended limitation of the liability of dock companies, except a bargain which they had concluded with the shipowners. If this absolutely new departure in the law of England were to be made, he hoped the Government would be held responsible for the alteration. He did not hesitate to say that, if it were argued on its merits, their Lordships' impartial judgment would lead them to reject this Bill.

COUNTY AND BOROUGH FRANCHISE ASSIMILATION (LONDON) BILL.

Read 3^a (according to Order), and passed.

TOWN COUNCILS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Amendments reported (according to Order), and Bill to be read 3^a on Tuesday next.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE (IRELAND) BILL.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD CLONCURRY said the Amendment standing in his name did not touch any question of ecclesiastical tithes or commuted tithes; it dealt only with a limited number of lay tithes. He had no personal interest in the matter, but was confident that there would be cases of gross injustice under the Bill if the Amendment standing in his name were not inserted.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 3, page 3, line 5, after Sub-section (3) to insert Sub-section (4):—(4) Where a tithe rent-charge has been varied by any order of a court of quarter sessions made after the passing of the Irish Church Act, 1869, the amount at which it stood before the making of the order shall, for the purposes of this clause, be taken and deemed to be the amount at which it stood on the twenty-second day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four."—(Lord Cloncurry.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): As I understand, the Amendment has nothing whatever to say to the great numbers that are represented by ecclesiastical tithe-payers, but is confined to a very small number of lay tithe-payers. My noble friend takes exception to the principle of the Bill, which is that there shall be a revision, not, as in the old times, once possibly every seven years, but once every fifteen years. My noble friend seems to think that because there may have been some lay tithe-payers who got a revision in 1872, therefore it would be unfair to subject the owners to another revision even after a lapse of sixteen years. But where is this picking and choosing of dates to stop? I do not think my noble friend has made out his case.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

*THE EARL OF ARRAN moved the omission of Clause 8, which ran as follows:—

"(1) Section 1 of this Act shall not apply to any annual sum charged upon land where the estate or interest therein of the person liable to pay such annual sum has, after the creation of such charge and before the thirteenth day of April one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, been conveyed to a purchaser on a sale.

"(2) Sections 3 and 4 of this Act shall not apply to any tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission out of hereditaments where the estate or interest therein of the person liable to pay such tithe rent-charge has, after the tenth day of August one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two and before the twelfth day of May one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, been conveyed to a purchaser on a sale.

"(3) Where the estate or interest conveyed was less than the first estate of inheritance this section shall not apply after the determination of such less estate or interest.

"(4) For the purpose of showing that this section does not apply a statutory declaration or such other evidence as the Land Commission may require shall be prima facie evidence.

"(5) The expression 'sale' in this section does not include a mortgage or a marriage or other family settlement or arrangement."

The noble Lord argued that this exclusion spoiled a tardy act of justice, and that the Government could not be enthusiastic in its favour as it did not form part of their original proposal. The clause was designed to exclude from the benefits of the Bill, so far as ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, both commuted and non-commuted, was concerned, certain persons who purchased estates charged therewith subsequent to 1869 and 1872, on the ground that these purchasers had notice when they purchased that commuted tithe rent-charge had been made payable by statute for fifty-two years, or that the non-commuted rent-charge had been deprived of its variable character by the Act of 1872. Admitting that much, it must also be admitted on the other side that most of these purchasers bought at the highest prices of the century; that they purchased titles which Parliament had guaranteed to be indefeasible with the object of tempting purchasers to come forward; that they purchased inter alia the right to fix the rents to be paid from time to time by their tenants, and that they not only had no notice that Parliament might some day pass the land legislation of 1881, but that so recently as in the debates on the Land Bill of 1870 and on Mr. Butt's Land Bill of 1876, Mr. Gladstone and all parties in the House of Commons except the Irish Home Rulers declared that such doctrines as fair rents, free sale, and fixity of tenure could not be listened to, and would amount to confiscation which would have to be paid for. Moreover, many tenant purchasers under the Purchase Acts bought subject to the payment of the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, and in such cases it would be unpopular as well as unjust to exclude them from the benefits of the Bill. Under these circumstances he hoped the Government would see the justice of withdrawing the clause and restoring the Bill to its original form.

Amendment moved—

"To leave out Clause 8."—(The Earl of Arran.)

THE EARL OF MAYO supported the proposal to omit Clause 8, failing to see the object of it. The second sub-section contained the sting. It simply meant that people who purchased an estate between 1872 and 1899 were to be excluded from the benefits of the Bill. They all knew that that was introduced at the instigation of a Nationalist Member, but he thought Nationalist Members in the House of Commons quite forgot that a very great number of tenants who had purchased would be hit by it. It seemed hard that landlords, and tenants who purchased between those dates, should not benefit in any way from this Bill. The clause was a niggardly clause, intended, it had been said, to strike at a certain gentleman who has purchased a large plot in Ireland, and the Bill would not be affected in any way if it were cut out.

LORD ASHBOURNE: The position in reference to this clause is one which I think I can state in a very few sentences to your Lordships. My noble friend who introduced the Amendment asked your Lordships not to spoil a tardy act of justice, and the noble Earl who has just sat down improved upon that by describing it as a niggardly little clause that might easily be left out. The Earl of Arran said this was a clause with regard to which the Government were not called upon to be specially enthusiastic. The Government are never enthusiastic. Their mission is to be just and fair, and to endeavour to present their views in clear and intelligible language. Two particular grievances are sought to be remedied, and are referred to in the section. The first is to reduce the period of payment from fifty-two to forty-five years, and the second is the question of a remedy for the hardships and inconveniences resulting from the abolition of the principle of revision in respect of ecclesiastical tithe. The clause is the outcome of discussion in the House of Commons, where it was urged that the two classes of tithe-payers referred to in the clause did not suffer under the grievance the Bill was intended to redress, inasmuch as the circumstances were fully known and taken into account when the purchases were made. It was pointed out that people who had bought with their eyes open to the fact that there could be no variation of the tithe could not be in the same position as the old owners of property. The Government admitted the force of the argument that these payers had not the same claim for variation and revision, and I hope the House will not yield to the appeal of the noble Earl, but will accept the clause.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: Does the noble Lord press his Amendment?

THE EARL OF ARRAN: Yes.

On Question whether the clause shall stand part of the Bill, their Lordships divided:—Contents, 45; Not-Contents, 28.

*LORD CLONBROCK moved the omission of Clause 9, which was as follows:—

“Sub-section 1 of Section 37 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896 (which dispenses with the consent of the Treasury to the redemption of tithe rent-charge as therein mentioned), shall not have effect in the case of any tithe rent-charge to which Section 3 of this Act applies.”

He had stated on the second reading that he did not propose to move any Amendment, but that referred to the Bill as it then was. He did not know that his noble and learned friend would move the introduction of this new clause. The effect of his Amendment would, he said, be to restore the Bill as it left the House of Commons, and to fix once more the former price at which tithe rent-charge could be redeemed. By the Act of 1869 the price was fixed at 22½ years purchase. This was decidedly exorbitant, for it was well known that before the Church Act the value of tithe rent-charge was only about seventeen years purchase at the outside. The Church Fund benefited by this increase to the extent of something like half-a-million sterling, and the tithe rent-charge payers who redeemed had to do so at this high rate. In 1896 it seemed to have dawned on the Government that the amount fixed was excessive, and a change was made to twenty years, not out of tenderness to the landlords, but simply because they found that the high price at which a landlord had to redeem his tithe rent-charge disinclined him to sell to the tenant, and that the system of purchase in which the Government were so much interested was thereby impeded. This was clearly stated on the introduction of the Land Bill of 1896 by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. In introducing the Land Bill of 1896 Mr. Gerald Balfour said*—

“How are you to quicken the pace [of the Land Purchase Acts]? First of all we must try in every way we can to oil the machinery. We must study the various impediments in the existing system which make tenants slow to buy and the landlords slow to sell. We must, if possible, remove those impediments, and try to make purchase more attractive to the tenants, and sale more attractive to the landlords. We have in this Bill made various proposals with a view to effecting this object.”

Mr. Gerald Balfour then proceeded to describe these proposals, and, on coming to the subject of tithe rent-charge, said—

“Another concession which we propose to make to landlords selling to their tenants has reference to the redemption of tithe rent-charge in case of sale. Under the Act of 1887 the Land Commission were empowered to allow the landlords to redeem the tithe rent-charge in case of sale at less than the statutory period of 22½ years provided the Treasury gave their consent. The Land Commission have, as a matter of fact, repeatedly applied to the Treasury to give their consent, and the Treasury have always refused it. Under this Bill the Land Commission are to be empowered to allow the landlords to redeem the tithe rent-charge at anything over twenty years purchase without asking the consent of the Treasury.”

It was this provision in the Land Act of 1896 which would be repealed by this clause. He commended these arguments to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. A landlord could only sell to his tenants at a considerable loss of income; in fact, he usually only did so from a feeling of despair at the unjust manner in which he had been treated, and in the hope that he thus might save something out of the fire. The change would therefore add to his previous disinclination to sell. Instead of trying in every way to "oil the machinery," the Government were, by restoring the twenty-two and a half years, doing the very thing which would impede the better and freer operation of the purchase system. They were taking away with one hand part of what was given with the other. The fund had gained half a million of money by this extravagant charge for a great number of years, and any loss which would be sustained must be by dribblets. Moreover, it could not be absolutely certain that there would be a loss, for in the Treasury Minute of 14th July of last year it was stated that—

"Neither the future annual extent of the operations under those Acts (the Purchase Acts) nor the proportion in which such operations will apply to lands subject to tithe can be predicted with any confidence."

It further stated that the Treasury contemplated that there might be a loss, only at some future period. If this fund had been charged by successive Governments with more than it could bear, it was hard that the tithe-payer should in consequence suffer by having a larger sum extracted from him. If the Treasury thought this clause so important, why was it not introduced before instead of being slipped in at the last moment? He hoped the Government would consent to his Amendment and restore the Bill to what it was when it left the House of Commons.

Amendment moved—

"To leave out Clause 9."—(Lord Clonbrock.)

*THE EARL OF ERNE thought they had some reason to complain of the course which had been taken in regard to this clause. The clause was forced upon the Irish Government by the Treasury and would not have been introduced otherwise. There were plenty of opportunities in the House of Commons for the clause to have been inserted, but this was not done. Many noble Lords had left London on the understanding that no alteration would be made in the structure of the Bill and that only drafting Amendments would be agreed to. As his noble friend had told the House, this clause practically confiscated two and a half years purchase of tithe rent-charge when they came to sell, and in that way took away one of the important concessions which were made to Irish landlords in 1896. Noble Lords from Ireland were placed in rather a difficult position in regard to this matter. He fully conceded that the Government had met them fairly, having pressed this Bill, which would give some relief, through the House of Commons at the expense of other Bills on the whole. He would suggest that his noble friend should be content with his protest and not press the Amendment.

THE EARL OF MAYO said this was an instance of rather sharp practice on the part of the Treasury. Why, he asked, should the Treasury suddenly slip in, in the passage of the Bill from one House to the other, a little piece of legislation which really cut off some of the benefits of the Bill? The tithe rent-charge was expected to be reduced 20 per cent. under the Bill, and £100 paid now would therefore become £80. Twenty years purchase of £80 would be £1,600, but twenty-two and a half years purchase would be £1,800; therefore the purchase money was increased by £200. It had not been possible to debate the matter in Committee because the Lord Chancellor of Ireland suggested that owing to the lateness of the hour the Amendments should be postponed till the present stage. This increase of two and a half years would not affect the Church Fund for a great number of years, and Mr. Balfour said in the House of Commons that it would not be in the least necessary to go into the question of the solvency of the Church Fund thirty years hence. What could be the object, therefore, of the Treasury adding on this two and a half years? What he objected to was that the clause had been put in after the Bill left the House of Commons. The Government had, so to speak, through the Treasury, gone back upon the arrangement that there should be no Amendments in the House of Lords. What an outcry there would have been if anything of the same kind had been done in a matter affecting the tenants.

LORD ASHBOURNE: I am very sorry that any noble Lord in this House should for a moment think that there has been anything in the slightest degree unfair or savouring of sharpness or unworthy practice in connection with this Bill. There has really been no change of view on this matter. The Chief Secretary expressed his views clearly in the other House in reply to an Amendment proposed by Mr. Dillon suggesting that there should be no redemption of ecclesiastical tithe save at twenty-five years purchase. The right hon. Gentleman then said he thought it would be reasonable that the price should not be less than twenty-two and a half years purchase. When I was moving the Second Reading of the Bill I referred to the way in which that matter would be dealt with. What is the history of this question? In the Church Act of 1869, Mr. Gladstone's measure as to the price of redemption was twenty-two and a half years purchase, and that has been the governing figure. When in 1887 a modification was suggested, it was subject to the assent of the Treasury, which was the arbiter. At that period the position of tithe rent-charge payers appealed to the sympathy of the Government. It was felt that the abolition of the power of revision by the Act of 1872 worked harshly. Prices had fallen, the English tithe rent-payer had been relieved to some extent, and therefore in 1896 it was deemed that the position of the Irish tithe rent-payer needed some further measure of consideration, and for the first time the Land Commission was given power at its discretion to say that redemption might take place at twenty years purchase. Under this Bill the power of revision is restored in a large and substantial way. The Treasury considered that the large reduction of the tithe-payers' payments under this Bill was a great and substantial benefit, and under those circumstances it was right to restore to the Treasury the power of saying whether twenty-two and a half years purchase was not the right figure. Whether you concur or not with the views of the Government or the Treasury, you will see that their action has been uniform and consistent all through, and that ample notice was given in the House of Commons.

CRUELTY TO WILD ANIMALS IN CAPTIVITY BILL.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

Amendments agreed to.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: The promoters of this Bill gave a pledge in the memorandum to the Bill that it should not affect any legitimate sport, such as hunting or coursing, and I was under the impression when I read the Bill that it carried out their intention. I consulted two of my learned colleagues in this House and they agreed with me; but the question was raised in the Standing Committee, and my attention was called to the fact that the Law Officers of the Crown were of opinion that it might be contended that stag hunting or rabbit coursing was included. The object of my Amendment is to remove any doubt on the subject.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 4, line 26, after '1876' to insert 'nor to the hunting or coursing of any animal which has not been liberated in a mutilated or injured state in order to facilitate its capture or destruction.'"—(Lord James of Hereford.)

THE EARL OF CORK: I am glad that my noble and learned friend has moved to insert these words, because there are very grave doubts whether the Bill in its present form would not put an end to rabbit coursing, a sport of which I am not enamoured, but one which affords much pleasure to many individuals. I am certain those who pursue this sport will thank the noble and learned Lord for his Amendment, and will do everything they possibly can to prevent in future any cruelty being done to these animals.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved—

"To insert as a new clause, 'This Act shall not extend to Scotland.'"—(Lord James of Hereford.)

Amendment agreed to.

Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

Amendment made; Bill read 3^a (according to Order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

OIL IN TOBACCO BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Viscount Cross): My Lords, I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill, which, though a small one, is one of considerable importance. Your Lordships will remember that under the Finance Acts manufacturers of tobacco are not allowed to use more than a certain amount of water. If the law is not complied with in this respect heavy penalties are imposed, but manufacturers of tobacco have evaded the law by using oil in addition to water. This is now done to an extent which makes it injurious to the consumer. It also seriously affects the revenue, and works hardly on the honest trader. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has introduced this Bill to stop this practice, which works mischief all the way round. The object of the Bill is to limit the amount of oil used in tobacco, the quantity of oil permitted by the measure as it stands being 3 per cent., but the Government are willing to extend it to 4 per cent. when the Bill gets into Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Viscount Cross.)

On Question agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

MILITIA REORGANISATION.

LORD BRAYE: My Lords, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in the general scheme for the reorganisation of the Army which, it is understood, is under consideration, the Government are prepared to pay special attention to the question of the Militia in general, and to the position of the Militia in time of war; whether the matter of Militia battalions volunteering for foreign and for active service will engage their attention, with a view to place the present uncertain, undefined, and unsatisfactory system on a proper basis; whether, in cases where a large portion of the battalion do volunteer and the minority do not, distinct regulations will be enacted to govern the acceptance or the rejection by the authorities of the offer; whether the present irregular system will be abolished—that is to say, the system (if it can be so called) whereby the volunteering is made to depend on the success of the persuasive powers of commanding officers, company officers, and non-commissioned officers, and whereby those (many or few) of the men who adhere to their engagement to serve only in the United Kingdom, except their consent is obtained to serve abroad, are placed at a disadvantage in the eyes of their fellow-soldiers; whether clear rules can be officially laid down as to the liability, in future, of the whole Militia to serve without volunteering; or whether, if that is not practicable, certain battalions can be raised and privileged to so serve; or, again, if that is impracticable, whether individual volunteers from Militia battalions will be accepted and transferred to the Regular Army, and incorporated therein; or, if that cannot be, whether any regulation will be framed which, in the opinion of the Government, can meet the desired end. I also wish to ask how many battalions of Militia have volunteered during the present war; how many of these have had their offers accepted, and how many rejected; whether any rule governs such acceptance and rejection; whether any battalions are ever asked by the authorities if they will serve or not, or whether the initiative has come, and is expected to come, from the battalions themselves; how many of the battalions who may have volunteered have done so unanimously; how many (if any) partially and conditionally; and how many (if any) have refused to volunteer; whether it is in contemplation to raise the Militia to a position approximating to the Regular Army, with adequate years of training, and with adequate pensions and foreign service, or to limit its service wholly to the United Kingdom, or to make any fundamental change in the organisation of the Militia.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): The noble and gallant Lord has adopted a procedure which is not without its advantage with the temperate at the present point. He has asked his questions in the briefest possible terms, and placed his arguments at some length on the Notice Paper. His questions relate to two matters. He desires, in the first place, to be made aware of our intentions with regard to various questions of importance affecting the Militia force, and he also asks for information as to certain matters of fact connected with the circumstances under which certain Militia battalions have lately been allowed to volunteer for service abroad. It may, perhaps, have escaped the attention of the noble Lord that, on the occasion of a recent debate on the subject of the Militia Ballot, I stated at length that there were certain changes which the Government intended to make at once in the Militia, but that with regard to the reorganisation of the force and the alteration of its conditions of service we proposed to take no final step until we had been able to consider other questions of Army reorganisation, which, as I tried to show your Lordships, are very intimately connected with the question of the reorganisation of the Militia. I told the House that I, for my part, was much attracted by the idea of rendering the whole of the Militia force liable in time of war for service beyond the United Kingdom. I recognised that that, of course, involved the reconsideration of the question of the Militia bounty and the general conditions under which the force was recruited, and that it would also mean the disappearance of the present system under which Militia battalions are allowed to volunteer for service abroad. If a change was made affecting the whole Militia force there would no longer be any occasion to resort to volunteering. It would disappear with all the inconveniences which are called attention to in the questions of the noble Lord. That being the case, I confess I do not think there is very much advantage in discussing hypothetically the regulations which might or might not be enacted for the purpose of governing the acceptance or the rejection by the authorities of the offer of Militia battalions to serve abroad; nor, of course, is it possible for me to give the noble Lord any information as to the rules which might hereafter be laid down as to the liability of the force to serve with or without volunteering. Still less is it possible for me to give the noble and gallant Lord any definite assurance of the kind which he seems to expect when he asks his last question as to the fundamental changes in the organisation of the Militia which we may hereafter find it desirable to introduce. I hope, therefore, that the noble Lord will not press me further on this point, but will be content with the assurance which I gave the House the other evening, and which, I think, satisfied those of your Lordships who were good enough to listen to me on that occasion. Then the noble Lord asks me some specific questions with regard to the circumstances under which certain Militia battalions lately volunteered for service outside the United Kingdom. The facts are these. Thirty battalions have gone to South Africa, four to the Mediterranean, and one to the island of St. Helena. Of these thirty-five battalions, thirteen volunteered without any intimation from the War Office that it was intended to offer them the opportunity of serving abroad. The other twenty-two battalions volunteered in response to an intimation made to them that their services would be acceptable should they be disposed to offer them. But besides the thirteen battalions which volunteered spontaneously, forty other battalions also volunteered without any invitation from the military authorities. The noble Lord asks whether there is any rule which governs the acceptance or rejection of these offers from Militia battalions. There is no fixed rule. The decision rests with the Commander-in-Chief, who is, I believe, influenced by the strength of the battalion, the age of the men of whom it is composed, and by its general reputation for efficiency. Another question the noble Lord asked me was, "How many of the battalions who have volunteered have done so unanimously?" I find that in every battalion there were a certain number of individual Militiamen who declined to serve abroad. There were five battalions which were offered the chance of so serving and which refused altogether, or, in other words, in those battalions the number of men who offered themselves was not sufficient to justify the acceptance of their services. I think those are the whole of the questions as to matters of fact which the noble Lord has asked me.

Marquess of Lansdowne.

I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that I am very far from disagreeing with the noble Lord in the view which I collect from his questions—namely, that there is a certain inconvenience in the system under which at present offers are accepted from Militia battalions. I have indicated to your Lordships that personally I should be very glad to see a change made in the constitution of the force which would enable us to get rid altogether both of the Militia Reserve, which is so unpopular with Militia officers, and also of the present system of volunteering. I do not think, so far as I am able to learn, that any undue pressure has been put upon the men, but I certainly think there is an objection to a system which lends itself to the suspicion that pressure of that kind may be applied.

LORD BRAYE: I beg to thank the noble Marquess for having put the matter so clearly before the House, and to express my pleasure that the Government have seriously in view the whole question of the Militia force.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE COLONIAL TROOPS AND WAR MEDALS.

EARL CARRINGTON: My Lords, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there is any truth in a rumour which has been widely circulated that a separate war medal or war decoration will be issued to Her Majesty's Colonial troops, or whether the Colonial troops will receive the war medal issued to British troops, and a fair proportion of all honours, distinctions, and rewards which will be granted to Her Majesty's troops raised in Great Britain and Ireland.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, there is no truth in the rumour that a separate war medal or decoration is likely to be bestowed upon Her Majesty's Colonial troops. The Colonial forces will receive the South African Medal, which will be bestowed upon the whole of the troops, British and Colonial, and it will be a medal of the shape and form usual in such cases. With regard to the other part of the question, I think the noble Lord may rest assured that a fair proportion of all honours, distinctions, and awards which may be granted to Her Majesty's forces will fall to the share of the Colonial troops, who have behaved with so much credit to themselves during the present campaign. I cannot undertake to discuss what the proportion will be, but my noble friend need have no uneasiness on that subject.

LORD STRATHCONA AND MOUNT ROYAL: I am sure the answer of the noble Marquess will give great satisfaction not only in the Colonies but throughout the mother country. I would suggest that the more promptly the medals can be given after the conclusion of the war the better they will be appreciated. Medals have been given within the last three or four months for services rendered thirty and thirty-four years ago. It would naturally have been more satisfactory to all those who were entitled to receive these medals, many of whom have died in the meantime, if they had been given within a reasonable time. I have no doubt that it will be otherwise in the present case.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Seven of the clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four of the clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

DUBLIN CORPORATION BILL.

Order for consideration, as amended read.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said of course he offered no opposition whatever to the Bill, but he wanted to know what was the position taken by the Government in regard to the recommendations made by the Joint Committee. The Amendments on the Paper in his name were all agreed Amendments. They were very numerous, but they were agreed to between the Dublin Corporation and the Dublin County Council and the other local authorities, and they were entirely non-contentious. One of the Amendments was not to be moved, because it was objected to by the county council. He had now to express the hope that the chairman of the Joint Committee, Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth, would be good enough to say a few words as to the position taken up by himself and the other members of the Joint Committee as to what should be done next session. There was a strong desire that an equalisation of rates should be made extending over the entire townships. He congratulated the chairman of the Committee on having proposed the recommendations with the unanimous assent both of the Members of the House of Commons and of the House of Lords forming the Committee. He thought he had done them very considerable service, but at the same time he did not say that Dublin did not wish for considerably more than they had got. Still they would take what they could get. He was sure that Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth would back up his recommendations, and he trusted that the Government would be induced next session to bring in a Bill as suggested. This was not the first time that local government matters had been dealt with in public Bills.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe) : Perhaps after the appeal made to me by my hon. and learned friend I shall be expected by the House to say a word or two, having had the honour to be chairman of the Joint Committee which for twenty-five days sat to consider this very contentious matter. We were practically unanimous, although we were unable to come to a unanimous view on some important points. Having failed to arrive at a unanimous view on those points, we did our best to arrange a compromise which, as we think, will carry out the main objects of the Bill, which are acceptable to us all. I am happy to say that in that we were successful. My hon. and learned friend has alluded to two points on which he is anxious to know what line the Government are likely to take. For that, of course, I cannot speak with any authority, but I should like to impress upon the Government publicly what I have done privately—namely, the justice and importance, and I might even say the necessity, of spreading the burden which now falls so heavily upon Central Dublin, upon the poorest of the poor, over the whole of Dublin, so that the richest townships, the residential parts of the town, should contribute their proportion towards the burden of taxation. I attach great importance to that. I do not think the strong sense of injustice now existing among the inhabitants of the city of Dublin can possibly be overcome unless the Government apply the same principle to Dublin as has been applied with so much success to London in the shape of the equalisation of rates. If Belgravia did not contribute as much as it does to the rates which fall so heavily upon the East End of London there would be a great scandal. Now that has been remedied in London, and I hope Her Majesty's Government may feel the absolute necessity of applying the same principle as has been applied with so much success in London to lighten the burden falling upon the poorer parts of Dublin. There is another point on which the Committee made a unanimous recommendation, which I hope the Government will consider. We were convinced that it would be absolutely absurd if the two drainage systems were to continue to exist side by side over the drainage area in Dublin, one dealing with untreated sewage falling into the bay within the city walls, while the system now being carried out by the Corporation of Dublin treats its sewage in a scientific way, which results in a comparatively pure effluent being poured out at the very point where Rathmines and Pembroke are discharging the impure effluent. There would be a great advantage in having a joint drainage board to manage the whole business of drainage, and the advantage would not be confined to having the drainage treated alike over both parts. There would be an immense advantage in having the necessary burden spread over the rich districts as well as the poor. It would be a further advantage, in the opinion of the Committee, if the three governing bodies—Pembroke, Rathmines, and Dublin—were to work on the same board, as they might learn to respect each other in managing that great business together. I have ventured to press upon the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland the views of the Committee on this subject. I understand the position they take up is this—they assure those who are interested in the subject, as all members of the Committee necessarily are after their laborious inquiry, that they will give the most careful consideration to the Committee's suggestions, and that they will forward their answer to the corporation before the month of

Mr. T. M. Healy.

November, in order that the corporation may be free to take such steps as it feels it its duty to do, supposing the Government do not deal with the question. I earnestly hope that, in view of this special inquiry by a Joint Committee of both Houses, and of the unanimous recommendations to which they have been able to agree, Her Majesty's Government will take up those points. If the Committee's recommendations are carried out, we shall consider that very good fruit has resulted from our labours.

Question proposed, "That the Bill be now considered."

Bill considered.

A Clause added.

Amendments made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) said that as a member of the Joint Committee he would be sorry if the House passed the Third Reading without an expression of opinion from some members of the Committee who sat on the Ministerial side of the House in support of the appeal made by the right hon. Baronet. He certainly was as much in earnest as the right hon. Baronet in hoping that the Government would give effect as soon as possible to the unanimous Report of the Joint Committee. He attached very great importance to the practical suggestions it contained. He was perfectly certain that the constitution of a joint drainage board would be fruitful of good results. It was rather interesting to remember that the Central Government of London really owed its existence to the institution of a drainage board for this great metropolis. While he personally felt unable to bring Rathmines and Pembroke, against their obvious desire, into the corporation, he did earnestly hope that the Government would give effect to the recommendations of the Committee.

SIR ROBERT MOWBRAY (Lambeth, Brixton) said he should like to associate himself, also as a supporter of the Government, with the appeal made by the chairman of the Joint Committee and by his hon.

friend the Member for Chelsea. He held the strongest possible opinion that this question should be settled on the lines they had recommended, and he earnestly hoped, therefore, that the Government would give serious attention to the recommendations of the Committee, and would carry them into law within a very short period of time.

MR. T. M. HEALY thought it was very greatly to be regretted that Government were, apparently, not ready to respond to the strong and unanimous appeal of the members of the Committee. It was unique, in the case of private Bills, that the members of the Conservative party as well as those belonging to the Liberal party on the Committee should join together in an appeal to the Government to make a statement as to their intentions on that particular subject. He would like to ask the Chief Secretary whether the Government would bring in a public Bill to carry out the recommendations, because, unless they did so, or announced their intention of doing so, the Dublin Corporation would be compelled in its own defence to undertake the expense of again introducing a private Bill to annex these two townships. If the Government would give the pledge asked for it would be a saving of public time and money.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I am afraid I am not in a position to go beyond what has been already said by the First Lord of the Treasury—namely, that the matter will receive the careful consideration that a recommendation from so important a body as this Committee deserves. At the same time I must say, with reference to what has fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman, that on Friday I saw the Lord Mayor of Dublin, who made a similar request, and I informed him that, although I could not give him an answer at the present time, I would give him an answer before the end of November as to the course the Government intend to adopt—in other words, that a definite answer should be given by the Government before it becomes necessary that the corporation should go to any expense in the matter of bringing in a new Bill to deal with the question next year. I hope the answer will be satisfactory.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton) said that, as the only other member of the Joint Committee in that House, he would like to support the appeal. Reference had been made to one side of the House and the other side of the House, but there had been no side of the House on the Committee. They were absolutely unanimous, not by any management, but by their own impulse. They believed that the state of the housing of the poor was a social danger in Dublin, and he hoped the Chief Secretary would give the matter his most careful attention.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS—CHINA PAPERS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if there is any news from China, and when the Papers relating to China will be laid on the Table.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have no further news from China. There are many unconfirmed rumours from various quarters. But we have no official information. As regards China Papers, I hope they will be in the hands of Members on Monday next.

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS IN CHINA.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state what arrangements have been made, or will be made, for the sick and wounded among the British troops in China.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): With the troops proceeding from India, numbering about 9,600 officers and men, thirty-three sections of field hospitals are being sent (825 beds); and in reply to a query from me the Viceroy has telegraphed that "they are fully provided with medical stores, which need not be sent specially from England." In addition to these troops from India, about 1,400 British officers and men are proceeding from Hong Kong, South Africa, and England. I am asking Hong Kong what field hospitals were sent on with their contingent. Three hospital ships are being provided. One by the Government of India; one, the "Maine," by the generosity of the Atlantic Transport Company and the benevolent exertions of American ladies; and one by the munificence of his Highness the Maharaja Sindia of Gwalior. These will all be fully equipped in every respect. The "Maine" sailed from Southampton on the 11th instant. In addition to these vessels, General Gaselee has been authorised, should he deem it necessary, to convert three selected transports into hospital ships. As soon as he reaches Wei-hai-wei, General Gaselee will report fully on the suitability of that place for the location of his base hospitals.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS INQUIRY.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to the statement of Lord Justice Romer at the opening of the sitting of the South African Hospitals Commission, that he or his colleagues had been appointed by the warrant of the Prime Minister; and whether he can say what authority the Prime Minister has for the issue of such a warrant; and will he have any objection to lay a copy of this document upon the Table.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Commission to which the hon. Gentleman refers is now a Royal Commission. Any Secretary of State, as the hon. Member is aware, has power to appoint a Commission.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Was Lord Justice Romer correct or incorrect when he said that he was acting under the warrant of the Prime Minister?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He certainly received the warrant of the Prime Minister.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: What was the authority of the Prime Minister to give that warrant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He is Secretary of State.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: It should have been a warrant from the Crown. I beg now to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will state why the South African Hospitals Commission was not created by statute and invested by statute with powers of examining witnesses on oath, enforcing the attendance of witnesses, and procuring documents.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There will be no difficulty in getting sufficient evidence. I certainly should not suggest the unusual course of making this a Statutory Commission until the necessity for it is demonstrated. Her Majesty gave her consent to this being a Royal Commission on the evening of Monday. I received it on Tuesday morning.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Was not the Pigott Commission a Statutory Commission?

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Commission to report on the arrangements for the care and treatment of the sick and wounded in South Africa has commenced its inquiry by virtue of a warrant issued by the Prime Minister; and, if so, what is the nature of this warrant, and by what authority, statutory or otherwise, has it been issued; whether it is intended to supersede this warrant by the issue of a Royal Commission; and, if so, when will the Royal Commission be issued; and, whether, seeing that compulsory powers to compel the attendance and examination of witnesses can be given by Parliament alone, he will at once introduce a Bill to confer these powers on the Commission, in accordance with numerous precedents.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have answered this question already.

MR. PICKERSGILL: When was the Royal Warrant issued?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Her Majesty gave her assent on Monday evening, and I received it on Tuesday morning.

MARTIAL LAW IN CAPE COLONY.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether martial law was proclaimed in the several districts of Cape Colony previously enumerated by the civil or the military authorities; whether it is still in force in these districts; and whether the proclamations were made by the civil or the military authorities.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Martial law was proclaimed by the Governor, and the proclamations were countersigned by the Prime Minister. Martial law has been withdrawn from three districts; from Cathcart and Queenstown by proclamation dated 16th July, and from Glen Grey by proclamation dated 23rd July.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—CIVIL SURGEONS—ALLEGED PLEDGE OF SECRECY.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is now in a position to give the House any further information respecting the statement that civil surgeons employed in South Africa have been required by the Army Medical Department to sign a contract in which they undertook not to divulge in any way what their impressions might be as to hospital matters.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): No, Sir. No reply has as yet been received from Lord Roberts.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): When may we expect one?

[No answer was given.]

COMFORTS FOR THE TROOPS— FAILURES IN DELIVERY.

MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that quantities of warm clothing, tobacco, and other comforts sent from time to time to the Imperial Yeomanry in South Africa have failed to reach their destination, notwithstanding every effort by the authorities in England; and that cablegrams have been sent from the Imperial Yeomanry offices in London and from the relatives of those engaged to the officer in charge of the base dépôt at Cape Town, and the reply prepaid, inquiring as to the non-delivery of parcels known to have arrived there, without receiving any reply; whether, in particular, a consignment of winter clothing and necessaries to the value of nearly £5,000, sent out to the Imperial Yeomanry at the front, was taken out to the Cape in the transport "Princess Royal," and actually brought back to London without having been landed; and, if so, will he state who is responsible, and will an inquiry be held.

*MR. WYNDHAM: An official complaint of the non-delivery of cases of stores despatched by the Imperial Yeomanry Committee has reached the War Office, and a full inquiry is being made at the various ports in South Africa. In the particular instance given the "British Princess" appears to be the transport intended; all the cases taken out in that vessel were landed.

HONNEN SPRUIT DISASTER.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state whether, at Honnen Spruit, near Kroonstad, on the 25th of June last, 300 ex-prisoners of war, sent from Pretoria to hold the spruit in anticipation of an attack by De Wet, were armed with old Westley-Richards and Mauser rifles surrendered by the Boers; that the party had no Maxims, and was without either a surgeon or hospital staff; whether, seeing that there were thousands of Mausers with a large supply of ammunition in Pretoria at the time, will he state who was responsible for the despatch of this force in such a condition; and whether he has been informed that the ignorance of the enemy as to the weapons with the force, coupled with Colonel Bullock's prompt action, alone saved the force from annihilation; and also that the safety of the wounded was entirely due to the voluntary services and marked resourcefulness of Dr. Lenthal Cheate, one of the consulting surgeons sent to the front, who was a chance passenger by the train that was attacked.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no information at the War Office respecting the matters alluded to in the question.

BOER WOMEN SENT TO THE ENEMY'S LINES.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if any further intelligence has been obtained relative to the sending Boer women living in the territory partially occupied by the English over into the Boer lines; and whether this action has the consent of Lord Roberts, and does it apply in its integrity to Boer women whose husbands are fighting for their country; and what is the number of women so treated, and by what method of conveyance are they forwarded.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir. No information has been received.

RESERVISTS' PAY AND ALLOWANCES.

MR. SHEE (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state what increases have been made in respect of bounty, pay, and allowances for Army Reservists, Army time-expired Reservists, Militia, and Militia Reservists, respectively, since the beginning of the war in South Africa.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The chief increases have been in the rate of separation allowance granted to men's families, in the bounties granted to Militiamen re-engaging, and in the amount of furlough with pay to be given on demobilisation. Two new grants, as distinguished from increases to old grants, have been made, viz., the special bounty of £22 to the Royal Reservists, and the grant of half-pay to the families of men leaving Government employment to serve with the Army or embodied Militia.

SOUTH CORK ARTILLERY MILITIA—CAMDEN FORT ACCIDENT.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the inquest held on the 15th instant upon the body of Gunner John Addis, of the South Cork Artillery Militia, who was killed on Monday by the bursting of the breech of a 40-pounder gun at Camden Fort, county Cork; whether the gun was one of four that were injured before, whether it was an out-of-date pattern and had been condemned, and whether he can state what precautions are taken to test guns before artillery practice is entered upon; and whether, in view of the circumstances of the case, the War Office will duly compensate the relatives of the deceased gunner, and also the other gunners who were wounded, one of them dangerously, upon that occasion.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No further report has yet been received in regard to this matter.

MR. FLYNN: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that I put this question down nine days since?

*MR. WYNDHAM: Yes. I have explained there has been one inquiry, and that the matter has been referred to experts on mechanical questions involved. One cannot hurry on such an inquiry.

MR. FLYNN: I want to know if any compensation is to be given to the relatives of the deceased man.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no provision for the widows of men killed in the service beyond a year's pay. There is compensation payable for people incapacitated by accident.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): Will the hon. Gentleman see that the recruiting sergeants make these facts known?

[No answer was given.]

JERSEY MILITARY GARRISON.

MR. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what is the approximate annual cost to the Imperial Exchequer of maintaining the military garrison in the Island of Jersey.

MR. WYNDHAM: The annual cost of the troops stationed at Jersey is approximately £91,000. But the whole of this cannot be considered as an additional charge on the British Exchequer arising from the defence of Jersey. If the infantry battalion were withdrawn we should still have to pay for it, and, in addition, we should have to provide a barrack for it elsewhere.

ARMY HEAD-DRESS — SOLDIER'S DEATH AT YARMOUTH.

MR. SOAMES (Norfolk, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any inquiry has been held with reference to the death of William Ward, a private in the Prince of Wales' Own Norfolk Artillery Militia, at Yarmouth, on the 18th instant, which death is alleged to have been the result of sun-stroke incurred on the journey from Sheerness on the previous day; whether Ward wore the field service cap or some other head-dress on the journey; and whether the War Office has yet come to any decision with regard to the future head-covering for our troops.

MR. WYNDHAM: This man was taken ill at 4.30 p.m. on the 17th instant while on a baggage guard at the South Town Railway Station, Yarmouth. The inquest verdict was "heat, overwork." On the journey he wore a helmet, but when working under cover at the station he wore a forage cap; he did not work in the sun at all. Inquiry will be made into the allegation of over-work. I have dealt with the question of a new head-dress in debate.

SALFORD VOLUNTEER ENGINEERS.

SIR J. W. MACLURE (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any reply has yet been received at the War Office from Major-General Swaine, commanding the North-Western Division, with reference to the formation of a Volunteer engineer corps whose headquarters would be within the Salford hundred of the county of Lancaster, and whether the offers of 1,000 men suitable for service in such a corps have been received; and whether he will undertake that the inefficiency of the arrangements in the formation of engineer Volunteer corps previously should not be used as an argument against the acceptance of so large a body of men under regulations made by the War Office sufficiently stringent to guarantee efficiency.

MR. WYNDHAM: The recommendation from the General Officer commanding the North-Western District has now been received, and the Secretary of State for War is prepared to authorise the formation of a corps of four companies of Fortress Engineers.

ALDERSHOT — RECREATIONS FOR TROOPS.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, seeing that the new canteens at Aldershot, shared by two battalions, have not met with general approval, he will consider the advisability of doing at home what Lord Roberts, when Commander-in-Chief in India, succeeded in doing there—namely, in making the recreation rooms more attractive by having entertainments in them instead of in the canteen, thereby encouraging a higher type of entertainment, while diminishing the temptations to drink.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member appears to be under a misapprehension. The present design of recreation room includes a stage where entertainments can be given.

CAPTAIN NORTON: My question is whether entertainments in canteens will be discouraged in favour of those in recreation rooms.

[No answer was given.]

RECRUITING—STATISTICS.

MR. SHEE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state what numbers, respectively, of fresh recruits and time-expired Army Reservists have joined the colours in England, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively, for the six months ended 30th June last, and what were the numbers in the corresponding period of last year.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The figures are as follows:—

Recruits.	1899.	1900.
England and Wales	13,764	22,028
Scotland	1,747	2,860
Ireland	1,923	2,343
	<hr/> 17,434	<hr/> 27,231
Re-enlisted men.
England and Wales	19,576
Scotland.....	2,825
Ireland	2,133
	<hr/> 24,534

I may add that these figures do not give an accurate idea of nationality, as sometimes Irish regiments are quartered in England and English ones in Ireland.

PROMOTION BOARD.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Promotion Board is still existing under the same organisation as heretofore; whether the promotions of all officers are considered by this Board or only those of generals and field rank; whether it is now the practice of the War Office to communicate to officers the decisions at which the Board have arrived, and whether the decisions of the Board are ever re-considered; whether the fitness of each officer to command in the field is decided by this Board; and whether, after the Board have reported an officer as competent to command in the field, and when under the test of active service such officer is ascertained not to be so qualified, any re-consideration of his qualifications takes place, or whether his name is retained on the qualified list, and the opinion of the Board prevails over the test of actual experience in the field.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Promotion Board exists under the same organisation as before. Its function is to report on colonels and lieutenant-colonels of three years standing as regards their fitness for promotion and employment. The decisions are communicated to the officers reported on when the Commander-in-Chief considers it desirable. It is open to the Board to reconsider its decisions. The fitness of each officer to command in the field is not decided by the Board, but by the Commander-in-Chief.

GENERAL LAURIE: Am I to understand that in all cases the decisions of the Board are communicated to the officers or not?

*MR. WYNDHAM: That is a matter in the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Can you give the names of the members of the Board?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I think there will be no objection if the hon. Member will put down a question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: They are very superior persons, I am sure.

ARMSTRONG'S MANCHESTER WORKS —WAGES.

MR. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that there are 120 joiners employed at the works of the firm of Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth and Co., Limited, Manchester, Government contractors for guns, ammunition, etc., and that these men are paid at the rate of 36s. per week of fifty-three hours, a few only being paid 37s. 6d. per week, though the rate of wages throughout this district is 9d. per hour, or 39s. 2d. per week of 49½ hours; whether he is aware that a deputation from the workmen recently met the manager and pointed out to him that they were not receiving the average rate of wages paid in the district, and that the manager declined to pay the same wages as other employers were paying; and whether, seeing that this is a breach of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons (February, 1891), he will cause an inquiry to be made with a view of giving effect to the terms of the said resolution.

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): I have caused inquiry to be made into the allegations contained in the question, and I will acquaint the hon. Member with the result when it is arrived at.

WOOLWICH ARSENAL—ACCIDENT IN 1881—JAMES QUINLAN.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the promise to inquire into the case of James Quinlan, who met with an accident when working in Woolwich Arsenal in 1881, will be redeemed; whether he is aware that Quinlan is at present in hospital, and has never recovered from the injuries inflicted while at Government work; whether medical certificates proving the injuries Quinlan suffered from will be taken into account, and whether he can state why his pension has not been granted and his sick pay never given; and whether the case will be thoroughly inquired into and substantial compensation awarded Quinlan.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: A promise was given to inquire further into the case, provided sufficient details were supplied to enable it to be identified. The honourable Member has not yet supplied the necessary information. If he will do so, I shall be happy to have the case thoroughly considered.

DR. TANNER: What information does the hon. Gentleman want?

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: The part of the factory in which he was employed, and the date on which he entered the service.

DR. TANNER: Why did not the hon. Gentleman tell me that three months ago?

DUKE OF YORK'S SCHOOL.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been recently directed to the condition of the laundry at the Duke of York's School; whether he is aware that the present building and arrangements have been described by the medical officer as old-fashioned, antiquated, insanitary, and unsatisfactory, and by a War Office Committee as deficient in labour-saving appliances, and causing an atmosphere unbearable when drying or folding clothes in wet weather; and whether he will endeavour to remedy a state of matters which has been further condemned by the Visiting Committee to the Board as not in a creditable state for a Government building.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): Yes, Sir; I believe the facts to be as stated. We have hitherto been prevented from renewing the plant and from carrying out the improvements asked for by want of funds. The matter will be carefully considered with the Estimates for next year.

FRENCH SUBMARINE BOATS.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if his attention has been called to the report that during the naval manœuvres of the French fleet the submarine boats "Narval" and "Morse" went through their various trials without a hitch.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): My attention is invariably called to anything interesting and instructive in connection with foreign fleets, and which may be regarded as authentic.

H.M.S. "REVENGE" — CORDITE EXPLOSION.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can now inform the House of the result of the inquiry by the Ordnance Committee into the cause or origin of the explosion of cordite in the magazine of H.M.S. "Revenge," in the Mediterranean some months ago.

MR. GOSCHEN: The cause or origin of the explosion of cordite in the magazine of H.M.S. "Revenge" is still under consideration by the Ordnance Committee. On May 9th that Committee made an interim Report, in which they summarised the facts of the case, and stated that they had asked for some further information and were awaiting this and the result of certain trials that were being carried out. From the evidence then before them they were unable to assign any cause for the said explosion.

FIRST SEA LORD—OFFICIAL RESIDENCE.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether representation was made by their Lordships to the Treasury respecting the making provision of a suitable residence for the First Sea Lord in Queen Anne's Gate, so that he should be near the Admiralty for the better discharge of his official duties, especially in time of war; whether, on the expiration of the lease of the house recently occupied by the late First Sea Lord, the landlord was willing to renew the lease at an increased rental of only £100, and did the Admiralty submit the proposal for Treasury approval, and with what result; and, seeing that in the evidence before the Duke of Somerset's Committee of 1871, stress was laid on the importance of one or more Sea Lords residing in the vicinity of the Admiralty, whether further representations will be made to the First Commissioner of Works, and to the Treasury, as to the necessity of thus meeting the wishes of the Admiralty in this matter in the interests of the public service.

MR. GOSCHEN: It is not the custom to communicate to the House Departmental correspondence of the kind referred to. I am in agreement with the Committee of 1871, as to the importance of the Senior Naval Lord residing in the vicinity of the Admiralty, and as I stated in answer to the noble Lord the Member for Roxburgh, endeavours are being made to arrive at a settlement.

COMMITTEE ON NAVY BOILERS.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can make any statement as to the constitution of the Committee on Boilers for Her Majesty's ships.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am not yet in a position to state the constitution of the Committee in question. Many persons have to be communicated with. I may possibly be in a position to answer the question on Monday, but I cannot pledge myself to a day.

THE VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA —SUGGESTED NAVAL REVIEW.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Shah of Persia, on his forthcoming visit to Her Majesty the Queen, is to witness a Naval Review, similar to that witnessed by his late predecessor; if so, will he state whether arrangements will be made, and vessels provided, for the Members of both Houses of Parliament to take part in the procession and review.

MR. GOSCHEN: It is a misunderstanding that there is going to be a Naval Review. The Channel squadron and probably a certain number of other ships will be at Spithead for inspection by the Shah, but there will be no procession or review.

THE SAILING TRAINING SQUADRON.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the fact that nearly nine months have now elapsed since the training squadron was put out of commission and laid up on 31st October, 1899, the Admiralty have arrived at any conclusion as to re-commissioning the squadron; if not, can he state the cause of the delay in arriving at a conclusion, and when a decision is likely to be reached; does he, in the meantime, propose to take any measures for providing the Navy with any training squadron whatever; or does he contemplate the advisability of leaving the Navy without any training squadron of any description; has he received reports showing that the captains of the Fleet are generally convinced that the sailing training squadron produces officers with qualities of excellence that cannot be obtained by any other training; if not, will he, before deciding to abolish the training squadron, take measures to ascertain the opinion of the captains, and communicate the general results of his inquiry to the House; and will he, in any case, before deciding to abolish the squadron, give this House an opportunity of discussing the matter.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Admiralty have not arrived at a final decision with regard to re-commissioning the masted training squadron. Their crews were turned over to a similar number of modern ships in which their general training is being continued. The sea training of the officers and men of the Navy is now being carried on in the sea-going ships in commission, over 200 in number. I have not received reports showing that the captains of the Fleet are generally convinced that the sailing training squadron produces officers with qualities not to be obtained by any other training; opinion in the service is much divided in this respect. It is open to the hon. Member to discuss the matter in question, should he wish to do so, when the Naval Estimates are before the House. No immediate decision is likely to be come to.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake not to abolish the squadron before the next Navy Estimates are introduced?

MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot give any undertaking of that kind, but I think it is highly improbable that a decision will be come to before then.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Then will the right hon. Gentleman take measures to inform himself of the opinions of the captains, as suggested in the third part of the question?

MR. GOSCHEN: It would be most unusual and undesirable for the Board of Admiralty, in forming their decisions, for which they alone are responsible, to refer to the service afloat in the way suggested. Their Lordships would, no doubt, to a great extent be guided by the opinions of experienced officers in the service, but it must remain with the Board—on whose shoulders responsibility rests, and who must necessarily have wider information as to the calls made on the Navy—to decide how far the opinions of those who have not the same information nor responsibilities can be accepted with regard to the requirements of the service.

COAL SUPPLY—RESERVE FOR NAVAL PURPOSES—PROHIBITION OF EXPORTATION OF ARMS BILL.

MR. HARWOOD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been called to the fact that the exports of coal from this country to France have increased during two years from 2,670,000 tons to 4,230,000 tons for a period of six months.

MR. FIRBANK (Hull, E.): I beg at the same time to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the supplies of coal which are daily being shipped to foreign countries for storage for naval purposes; and whether, as the Government are bringing in a Bill to check the exportation of arms, ammunition, and military and naval stores from Great Britain, he will consider the desirability of extending the provisions of the Bill so as to include so important a munition of war as steam coal for foreign navies.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe the facts as regards the export of coal are as stated. The Bill which awaits Third Reading in the House of Lords does apply to coal as well as to other naval and military stores.

INDIAN RAILWAYS—FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. A. H. A. MORTON (Deptford): On behalf of the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the methods of calculating the rates of interest (which were settled by the Bank of England), regarding the termination in 1884 and 1886 of the Eastern Bengal and Scinde Railway contracts, have never been checked or investigated by the India Office; and, if no knowledge of this financial transaction is on record at the India Office, whether he will now seek to secure this information for official purposes, and also for publication.

LORD G. HAMILTON: In the cases to which the question refers the contracts prescribed that the rate of interest should be determined by the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England. As I stated on Monday last,* I have no knowledge of the manner in which they calculated the rate, and it would have been most improper for the Secretary of State for India to interfere. I do not propose to take any such steps as are suggested in the latter part of the question.

BRITISH OFFICERS IN INDIAN NATIVE REGIMENTS.

MR. STANHOPE (Burnley): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state the estimated annual cost to be incurred by the proposed addition of ninety-two European officers to Punjab and Bengal native regiments; and whether these officers will be always selected from the Indian Staff Corps, or from officers of British regiments serving their term in India, in some cases, appointed by patronage or by the Commander-in-Chief; and whether selections for these additional officers could be made from experienced native commissioned officers already borne on the strength of these Punjab and Bengal regiments.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The addition of ninety-two British officers to the Indian Establishment will involve a gradually increasing expenditure, which it is estimated will eventually amount, about twenty-five years hence, to about eight and a quarter lakhs of rupees per annum. These officers will form an increase to the Indian Staff Corps, which is recruited partly by appointments direct from Sandhurst, and partly, under strictly defined regulations, from British regiments serving in India. The object of the measure is to increase the number of British officers in India, and this obviously would not be attained by selecting native commissioned officers.

INDIAN TRADE STATISTICS.

SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAG-GREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he will give in separate figures the value of manufactured articles and raw materials respectively which are comprised in the general headings "Export of Merchandise," and "Imports of Merchandise," in the table relating to trade at page 9 of his Explanatory Memorandum for 1900-1901.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Member will find the details for which he asks at pages 24 and 25 of the Explanatory Memorandum.

THE "KOWSHING."

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the case of the "Kowshing" has ever been submitted to arbitration; if it has been so submitted, can he state with what result; and, if not, will he explain the cause of the delay.

*MR. BRODRICK: The case has not yet been submitted to arbitration, and the delay has arisen in consequence of a difference of opinion between the Chinese Minister and Her Majesty's Government with regard to the terms of reference, which the Minister has been obliged to refer to his Government.

VACCINE LYMPH.

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received information of the bacterial impurity of the vaccine lymph now or recently supplied for vaccination; whether he is aware that certain brands of lymph, including that supplied by the Local Government Board, have developed colonies of germs, rendering their use improper for vaccination; and whether he will prohibit the use of such lymph in vaccination until freedom from contamination by them may be ensured.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): In reply to the first paragraph, I have received no information as to the bacterial impurity of the vaccine lymph now or recently supplied by the Local Government Board which renders its use improper for vaccination. The answer to the second and third paragraphs is in the negative.

FOOD PRESERVATIVES.

MR. LAMBERT: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state when the Departmental Committee on the use of preservatives in food may be expected to report; whether he is aware that summonses are being now issued by local authorities for adding to Devonshire clotted cream a small quantity of boracic acid solely as a preservative; and whether he will communicate to such local authorities the undesirability of proceeding with prosecutions on this point until the Report of the Departmental Committee has been issued.

MR. CHAPLIN: I am informed that some delay has been occasioned by a series of experiments the issue of which will not be known for some months yet, but the Committee hope to complete their Report by the end of this year. I understand that some local authorities have recently instituted proceedings in cases such as those referred to in the question. The Local Government Board, however, have no authority to prevent such proceedings being taken, and they could not undertake to interfere with the discretion of local authorities in the matter.

MR. LAMBERT: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to communicate to the local authorities the fact that the Committee will report by the end of this year?

MR. CHAPLIN: No doubt the information will reach them in due course.

MR. LAMBERT: But it will have more weight if sent direct.

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not see any necessity for it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): As this is a matter which affects Ireland, I will ask, if it be considered a reasonable request, that the Home Office should issue a circular to magistrates advising them to defer prosecutions in relation to these matters until the scientific point has been settled.

MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot give any advice to the Home Office.

DIDSBURY VOLUNTARY SCHOOL RATE.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that in the township of Didsbury, Manchester, a voluntary school rate is applied for by the collector of, and in conjunction with, the ordinary rates of the township, and in some cases on the same demand note; and whether the Board has taken any, and what, action in the matter.

MR. CHAPLIN: I am aware of the facts referred to in the question. The Local Government Board have made inquiry into the matter, and they informed the collector on the 24th instant that the demand note for a voluntary rate should not be sent out with the demand for a compulsory rate. I understand that in a few cases the demand for the voluntary rate was made on the same demand note as the poor and general district rate. It was done without the collector's instructions by one of his clerks, and the collector immediately stopped it.

BURNLEY MINERS—CHECK-WEIGHING CLAUSES.

MR. STANHOPE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has now given full consideration to the petitions presented to him on behalf of a section of the miners of the Burnley district to be relieved from their present exemption, and to be placed under the provisions of the weighing clauses of the Mines Regulation Acts; whether he has caused examination to be made into the genuineness of these petitions, showing as they do in the case of the pits in question an almost unanimous desire on the part of the underground workers to be placed under the protection of the ordinary law regulating the payment of wages calculated by weight and not by measurement; whether he has received an assurance that such an inquiry, or a ballot jointly conducted on behalf both of the employers and employed, would be welcomed by the miners themselves; and whether, seeing that the Secretary of State has the power, under the Mines Regulation Acts, to make an order enforcing the check-weighing clauses of those Acts in respect of any mine or group of mines, on being satisfied as to the feeling among the miners employed in the mines in question, he will make an order giving them the protection accorded by Parliament to miners in general.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The matter has been constantly before both myself and my predecessors, and I have again considered it very carefully. I am satisfied that the signatures to the recent petitions are genuine, but on the other hand they do not show by any means an unanimous desire on the part of the miners for the revocation of the exemptions. I am not, however, in favour of continuing the exemptions unless it is clear that it is desirable in the best interests of all parties. But the matter appears to me to be so difficult that I have resolved to direct a special inquiry to be held, at which the representatives of all persons interested can be heard.

DANGEROUS TRADES REGULATIONS—REDUCTION OF ARSENIC.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether an inquiry was held in 1899 into the nature of employment in the extraction of arsenic; whether he has received a Report upon the subject; and, if so, whether it will be laid upon the Table of the House; and whether it is proposed to amend the existing special rules relating to this employment.

SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I instituted an inquiry last year with regard to the health of the persons employed in certain works for the reduction of arsenic in Devon and Cornwall. I have not yet received the final Report on this inquiry, but I gather from an interim Report made some time ago that it is not likely that the establishment of any new special rules in these works will be necessary.

MR. TENNANT: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay the Papers when the Report is completed?

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I should think there will be no objection to that.

MARINE BIOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION—PLYMOUTH LABORATORY—STOCK-HOLM CONFERENCE.

MR. PRICE (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government made it a condition, when granting a subsidy to the Plymouth Laboratory of the Marine Biological Association, that space should be provided for the carrying on of investigation by such official bodies as the Fisheries Department of the Board of Trade; and whether any naturalist has ever been employed by the Board of Trade or other Government authority to make investigations on fishes at the Plymouth Laboratory; and, if not, will he explain on what grounds.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): In 1885 the Treasury, when agreeing to a grant to the Plymouth Laboratory of the Marine Biological Association, made it a condition "that the Council undertakes to place space in the Plymouth Laboratory at the disposal of any competent investigator deputed by a recognised authority to carry out any investigation into fish questions which the laboratory can give facilities." The Board of Trade have never employed any naturalist to make investigations on fishes at the laboratory, and they have no staff or funds to devote to such a purpose. I have no information as to what has been done by other Government authorities.

MR. PRICE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his Department has ever consulted the council of the Marine Biological Association (a body in receipt of public money) on any subject connected with fisheries; and, if so, when and on what subject, and in particular whether the council was consulted with regard to the Bill dealing with undersized fish, now withdrawn.

MR. RITCHIE: The Board of Trade have occasionally consulted the council of the Marine Biological Association on fishery subjects. The latest occasion had reference to the question of the fisheries exhibit at the Paris Exhibition. The inspectors of the Board of Trade have on many occasions consulted the officials of the association in an informal manner. The association were not directly consulted by the Board of Trade as to the Bill dealing with undersized fish, which, however, was founded on the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1893, who took evidence from the association.

MR. PRICE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Marine Biological Association was consulted with respect to the Fisheries Conference held at Stockholm last year, to which Her Majesty's Government sent several delegates; whether any delegate was selected from the staff or council of that association; and whether he will consider the advisability both of increasing the Government grant to the association to £2,000 a year, and at the same time making use of the information so paid for before entering upon restrictive legislation or international agreements with regard to fishing matters.

MR. RITCHIE: So far as I am aware the Marine Biological Association were not consulted with respect to the Fisheries Conference at Stockholm, and no delegate was selected from the staff or council of that association. The question of increasing the grant of public money to the association is one for the consideration of the Treasury. Any information or advice that may be afforded by the association will always receive careful consideration from the Board of Trade, who are most desirous of acting in friendly relation with the association.

SERVICE.

MR. LAMBERT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that passenger steamers from Jersey to England are often delayed for two or three hours at Guernsey, and COMMITTEE ROOMS — OUTSIDE BLINDS—VENTILATION.

Mr. COHEN (Islington, E.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will arrange before next summer to have outside blinds fixed to the windows of the committee rooms facing the south and the west, of which the temperature last week, during the protracted sittings of the Standing Committee on Trade, owing to the absence of outside blinds, obliged several Members to leave the committee room.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg, at the same time, to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has had recently under consideration the question of ventilation of the committee rooms and dining rooms of this House; and, if so, whether he is in a position to make any statement on the subject.

Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS: In reply to these questions, I have to say that I have been giving attention to the subjects referred to, and that I propose to ask the Treasury to sanction provision in the Estimates to enable me to proceed with the improvements in the ventilation of the committee rooms by means of electric fans, in accordance with the arrangements in the rooms already satisfactorily treated. As an accessory measure, and to provide a more comfortable atmosphere, I hope to have outside blinds fitted before next summer.

NORWOOD GREEN (MIDDLESEX) POSTAL DELIVERIES.

Mr. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it is possible to improve the collection and delivery of letters, which have been for so long a time defective, in Norwood Green, Middlesex; and, if it be possible, whether the Department will proceed forthwith to make the necessary improvement.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY Mr. HANBURY, Preston) The Postmaster General regrets to find that on several days recently the delivery of letters in the neighbourhood of Norwood Green was delayed owing to the illness of the postman. The service is now being worked with punctuality.

STRAW HATS FOR POSTMEN.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if attention will be given to the supplying of straw hats in the present hot weather to postmen in lieu of the kepi, and if some alteration will be made in the present summer uniform; and can he state whether postmen are required to wear waistcoats tightly buttoned up in this weather.

Mr. HANBURY: Postmen are already supplied with serge uniform for summer wear. Postmen in London are also supplied with a light summer shako. In hot weather the men are allowed to wear straw hats, though they are not a part of the official uniform. The answer to the second paragraph is in the negative.

Mr. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the order as to the wearing of straw hats in London is not general? Will he make it so?

Mr. HANBURY: It is not an order; it is a permission.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Is it true that postmen on very hot days are punished if they take their coats off and carry them on their arms? Can that not be allowed?

Mr. HANBURY: I will consult the Post Office authorities as to that.

DR. TANNER: Seeing that other uniformed servants are not required to wear waistcoats, cannot the same regulation be applied to postmen?

Mr. HANBURY: I said the answer to the second paragraph was in the negative.

Mr. STEADMAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that permission to wear straw hats has not been given to the postmen in the East End of London yet?

[No answer was given.]

POSTMEN'S HOLIDAYS.

Mr. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can see his way to allowing overseers to sign a special holiday sheet, instead of blocking postmen out for the better portions of the year for their holiday season.

MR. HANBURY: At all offices, where the arrangements permit it, postmen sign a separate holiday sheet, but this cannot be done everywhere without injustice to some of the persons affected or waste of force. The postmen receive their annual leave during the eight months from March to October inclusive.

SORTERS' EXAMINATIONS.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether there is either rule or practice at present in the Post Office Department by which candidates for the position of sorter or telegraph learner in head provincial offices, who at their first examination do not gain the minimum percentage for appointment, are excluded from ever again being admitted to examination; whether a similar rule prevails in any other branch of the public service; and whether arrangements will be made in this Department, as in all other branches of the Civil Service, to admit candidates within the prescribed limits of age irrespective of previous failures at examinations.

MR. HANBURY: Where positions as sorters or learners in the Post Office service are offered as the result of open competition, competitors who have been unsuccessful are allowed to compete again so long as they are within the limits of age. There are, however, chiefly at the smaller offices, posts which are filled by nomination subject to a qualifying Civil Service examination, and persons who have received nominations, but reach such a low standard in the examination that their ultimate success is improbable, are not as a rule allowed to try again, it being in their own interests that they should at once seek more suitable employment.

THE DISTRICT MESSENGER COMPANY.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, will he state whether the District Messenger Company pays any royalty or tax to the Post Office; and, if so, what the amount of the royalty is, how it is calculated, and where the amount will be found in any accounts laid before the House; on what ground the royalty in question is exacted from the company, and whether in pursuance of any judicial decision affirming the liability of the company to pay it; has the Post Office, since the establishment of the company, organised a special service with the special object of competing with the company; and, if so, has this special service resulted so far in a loss or in a profit to the Post Office; and will the Post Office, in view of the great and increasing use to the public of the District Messenger Company's services, consider the propriety of ceasing to exact from the company the royalty hitherto paid by it.

MR. HANBURY: The company pays a royalty on telegraph call boxes calculated at the rate of 6d. per call box, with a general royalty of £25 per annum. This royalty is exacted on account of the company's operations in the use of such call boxes being an infringement of the Postmaster General's telegraph monopoly. On the 14th of April, 1891, a decree was made by the Queen's Bench Division restraining the company from transmitting telegrams and conveying letters in violation of the exclusive privileges conferred upon the Postmaster General; and the company has since carried on business as regards telegrams and letters under the licence and authority of the Postmaster General. The company is required to pay to the Postmaster General 1d. upon each letter which it delivers, and pay over such postage to the Postmaster General. On the other hand, the Postmaster General pays to the company for services rendered $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per letter out of moneys voted by Parliament. The amounts paid over by the company appear in the finance accounts presented to Parliament under the heading of "Gross Receipts." They are not shown separately. The Post Office organised an express delivery service for the purpose of meeting a public want as soon as this was ascertained to exist, and the service is largely used by the public. Its establishment has not resulted in a loss to the Department, and it is believed to be profitable; but owing to its being worked in connection with the other services of the Department it is not possible to state exactly the amount of profit earned. It is not proposed to make any further reduction in the Royalty upon call boxes, or to increase the payment made to the company for the delivery of letters.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: May I ask my right hon. friend whether he can arrange that this royalty shall appear separately in the finance account, and whether he is aware that eleven out of nineteen Cabinet Ministers are box-holders?

MR. HANBURY: I cannot say anything about the latter point, but with regard to a separate account I think a Return ought to be made to the House showing what the expenses are.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will my right hon. friend agree to a Return if I move for it?

MR. HANBURY: I do not like to reply for the Post Office, but I should think there would be no difficulty about it.

JUNIOR CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury will he explain why it is proposed to amend the rules of the Civil Service Commissioners, which provided that those who passed the Junior Civil Service Examinations could, when competing for other Civil Service examinations, deduct from their actual age any time up to five years which they may have spent in the service, so that a junior can now only deduct one year when competing for an Excise assistantship; whether he is aware that this rule would operate hardly against persons who entered the service under the old rules; and whether he will take steps to exempt from the operations of the new rule the said persons.

MR. HANBURY: The principal reason for this change was that it is considered inexpedient in the interests of the public service that anyone should become an assistant of Excise at an age exceeding twenty-three years. More than a year's notice of this change was given, as it will not come into force until July next; so that anyone interested has ample time to make his arrangements. There seems no reason for any further postponement of a desirable reform. No vested interest in the old regulations can be recognised.

VOL. LXXXVI [FOURTH SERIES.]

CUSTOMS WATCHERS.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has taken any steps to carry out the suggestions made by him with a view to increasing the wages of deserving Customs watchers after a certain number of years service; and can he hold out any hopes that such improved conditions of service will be assured to these men.

MR. HANBURY: Yes; improved conditions of service will be assured to the more deserving Customs watchers after a certain number of years service.

SCOTTISH SHERIFF COURT PROCEDURE.

MR. WALLACE (Perthshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if any report has yet been received from the Departmental Committee on Sheriff Court Procedure appointed more than two years ago; and, if such report has been received, whether the Government propose to take any action on the same; and, if no report has yet been made, can he state when the same may be expected.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The Report has not yet been made, nor can I name any definite time at which it may be expected. The reference to the Committee was a very wide one, and the constitution of the Committee is such that it can only meet during the winter months.

CARRICKMACROSS WORKHOUSE.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the number of admissions to the Carrickmacross workhouse during the past year, according to the report recently issued by the local board, appears to be about twice as great as the admissions to Castleblaney and Monaghan workhouses, although the valuation of Carrickmacross union is only about half the valuation of Monaghan and less valuation than Castleblaney union; whether he is aware that the admissions to the Carrickmacross workhouse during the past twelve months was about three times as great as to Clones workhouse, and that the 2,172 admissions to Carrickmacross workhouse during the year were almost entirely composed of tramps or casuals; and whether the Local Government Board inspector for Carrickmacross district has reported on this matter and suggested any remedy; and, if not, will he ask for a report, with a view to preventing further loss to the ratepayers of Carrickmacross union by having to support a number of persons who do not belong to the district.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The figures in the first and second paragraphs are approximately correct. The Local Government Board are not aware that the admissions to the Carrickmacross workhouse during the past year were almost entirely composed of tramps or casuals, though it is probable that a large proportion of the admissions did belong to this class. The Board's inspector has made no special recommendations as to the relief to be afforded to the tramps, but the Board have issued circulars on the subject to boards of guardians from time to time, and are prepared to instruct the inspector to confer with the Carrickmacross guardians at any time in the matter should the guardians so desire.

DROMORE RIVER FLOODS.

MR. DALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at recent meetings of the Monaghan County Council complaints were made against the Board of Works and the Lough Erne Drainage Board in consequence of the flooding of thousands of acres of land between Ballybay, Sporthall, and Coot-hill, owing to the want of drainage of the river passing through these districts; and whether he will take steps to prevent a recurrence of the flooding of the districts mentioned by clearing an obstruction in the Dromore river near Tullyvin, and thus prevent a loss of the crops of the people holding land in the low-lying districts between Ballybay and Tullyvin.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Representations to the effect mentioned in the first paragraph have already been made by the County Council to the Board of Public Works, and the matter has been investigated by that Department, who have informed the Council that as the Dromore river is not within the area of any drainage district no steps can be taken by the Board with a view to the removal of the obstruction complained of.

LIMERICK TELEGRAPH MESSENGERS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, seeing that the telegraph messengers of Limerick are entitled to receive one halfpenny per message on all messages they deliver, he will explain why this payment has been withheld from them during the past three months; and, will he take steps for the arrears to be paid and the rule of one halfpenny per message to be observed regularly in future.

MR. HANBURY: It is not the case that the telegraph messengers are entitled to receive one halfpenny per message on all messages they deliver. The payment made to them is already high and cannot be increased; and no arrears are due.

CAHIR POST OFFICE.

MR. MANDEVILLE (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it is the intention of the Department to build a new post office in the town of Cahir, county Tipperary; and if so, when will they be prepared to commence the work of building it.

MR. HANBURY: A scheme for the erection of a new post office at Cahir is under the consideration of the Post Office, but has not yet been sanctioned by the Postmaster General. I cannot, therefore, state when the building is likely to be commenced.

DUBLIN SORTING STAFF.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been drawn to a memorial received by the Controller, Dublin, over three months ago, from members of the Dublin staff complaining of punishments for the mis-sending of letters, alleging that the increase in mis-sending was due to insufficiency of time at roads, and the quick rate at which p.m. despatching officers have to sort correspondence, the sorting of letters on the new divisions, and asking that letter-despatching officers be exempt from sorting at the primary tables in the evening; and can he state whether the memorial has been acknowledged yet; and if so, with what result.

MR. HANBURY: The memorial was duly received and acknowledged by the Controller, Dublin. Inquiry has shown that some additional force is necessary on evening duty in the Dublin Sorting Office, and steps are being taken to afford relief. At the present extra staff is brought on duty whenever it is known that the work will be heavier than the average. The bulk of the mis-sending is found to be confined to comparatively few men, and increases when these men are on duty. No record of mis-sending is made against any officer when there is any doubt as to his responsibility.

COUNTY KILKENNY POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he can explain the delay in establishing the house to house delivery of letters in the townlands of Boggan and Blanchfieldboy, county Kilkenny, and say when it will come into operation.

MR. HANBURY: A house-to-house delivery of letters once a week was commenced on the 18th of June in the townlands of Boggan and Blanchfieldboy, county Kilkenny. There are very few letters for these places, and a more frequent delivery is not at present warranted.

COAGH (TYRONE) POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. DOOGAN (Tyrone, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he has received a further detailed statement from the residents of Coagh, county Tyrone, suggesting how the defects in their postal service could be remedied at slight, if any, cost; and, whether the Coagh memorial praying for redress, which was refused last year on the ground of expense, will be reconsidered in view of the fresh information furnished.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General has received a further detailed statement from the inhabitants of Coagh, county Tyrone, suggesting how a better postal service to that place could be provided. The desired improvements, however, could not be afforded without considerable additional cost. Even if a service between Cookstown and Coagh could be provided at practically the same cost as the present service between Moneymore and Coagh, which does not seem likely, considerable additional expenditure would still be necessary in order to maintain the existing delivery to places on the road between Moneymore and Coagh; and such expenditure would not be warranted.

BUNDORAN MAILS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been directed to the inconvenience entailed on the inhabitants of Bundoran by the delay in the day mails from Dublin and the consequent inability to reply by evening post to letters received by those mails; whether he is aware that the Bundoran letters are sent by the 6.5 a.m. train from Dublin, via Portadown and Omagh; are detained at Omagh, where they arrive at 9.30 a.m., till 12.25; do not reach Bundoran till 3 p.m.; and are not delivered till 4 p.m., the time when the evening mail goes out; whether he is aware that, while an express train leaves Dublin at 9 a.m., and reaches Bundoran, via Clones, at 1.40 p.m., the letters for Bundoran are sent some hours earlier and reach Bundoran some hours later than the parcel post, which is sent by this train; whether letters for Bundoran could be sent from Dublin by the 6.5 a.m. train, which arrives in Enniskillen at 10.5 a.m. and be taken up by the express passing Enniskillen at 12.33, and due in Bundoran at 1.40; and whether immediate steps will be taken to secure that letters should reach Bundoran from Dublin in time to be answered by the evening post.

MR. HANBURY: These letters now arrive at Bundoran at 2.25 p.m., and are sent out for delivery at 2.50 p.m. Some persons, however, living near the end of the delivery do not receive them in time to post replies for the return mail at 4 p.m. During the summer months an express train, as stated in the question, leaves Dublin at 9 a.m., and to reach Bundoran at 1.40 p.m. This train, however, could not be used for correspondence from Omagh and other places north of Dundalk, and even if it were used for the mails from Dublin, it is doubtful whether the residents at Bundoran would be willing that the afternoon delivery should be made before the arrival of the correspondence from Omagh, etc. The question whether a double service to Bundoran would be justified during the summer is being considered, and if that is found to be the case, inquiry shall be made as to the wishes of the residents in regard to the time of the delivery.

DRUMCONRATH POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Postmaster General has received a memorial influentially signed by the gentry and traders of Drumconrath, asking for the establishment of direct postal communication between Drumconrath and Nobber; and whether it is intended to establish the service asked for; and, if so, when.

MR. HANBURY: This memorial has been received. It is proposed to arrange for the postman from Nobber and the postman from Drumconrath to meet every week day at Summerhill and exchange letters. By this means local letters will be available to callers at the Post Office at either place shortly after one o'clock on the day of despatch. This arrangement will be commenced at an early date.

CORK POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Postmaster General has considered the memorial presented more than twelve months ago from the residents of Ashburton, Dillon's Cross, Mayfield, and neighbourhood on the north-east side of the city of Cork, to have a post office established at Dillon's Cross, the district being at present only served by a wall letter-box; and whether, in view of the fact that the nearest post office is a mile away from the greater portion of the district in question, which is one where the population is increasing and many new houses are being built, and of the inconvenience caused by the present want of postal facilities in this important and growing district, a post office will be opened there, as requested.

MR. HANBURY: No such memorial has been received. The Postmaster General has called for a report, and will communicate his decision upon it in due course to the hon. Member.

CLONES WATER SUPPLY.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that dissatisfaction exists among the inhabitants of Clones with the quality of the water supplied to that town; and can he say when a report upon the condition of the filter beds of this supply was received from the sanitary officer; and will he instruct the Local Government Board to send an inspector to Clones to report upon this matter, so that all apprehension as to the purity of the water may be allayed.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: No representations have been made to the Local Government Board as to the quality of the Clones water supply, and the Board are unable to say when a report upon the condition of the filter beds was received from the sanitary officer. The medical inspector of the Board has been directed to make special inquiries into the matter on the occasion of his next visit to Clones.

ROSSAVALLEY (FERMANAGH) TENANTRY.

MR. DOOGAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can explain why the tenants of Rossa Valley, county Fermanagh, who purchased their holdings from Messrs. Bracken and Gordon, joint landlords, in November, 1898, have had to pay, and are still paying, half-yearly instalments to the Irish Land Commission at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the purchase money, whilst the tenants on the adjoining estate of the Commissioners of Education, who purchased about the same time, had to pay instalments at the rate of only 4 per cent. per annum.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This question refers to interest in lieu of rent payable by the tenants to the vendor pending the completion of the sale, and not to half-yearly instalments of annuities payable to the Land Commission. The amount of interest payable in such circumstances is a matter of agreement between the tenants and the landlord.

IRISH PUBLIC HOUSE LICENCES.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will arrange for an annual return of the number of new public-house licences granted and extinguished in each quarter sessions division in Ireland, showing in each case whether the new licence was granted in substitution for an existing licence.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I would refer the hon. Member to Table 60 in the volume of Judicial Statistics (Ireland) for 1899, recently presented to Parliament, the information in which may serve the purpose he has in view. If not, perhaps he will communicate with me further in the matter.

THE BREHON LAWS.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can say whether any and what progress is being made towards the publication of the promised volumes of the Irish Brehon Laws; and whether, on account of the death in July, 1899, of the Right Rev. Dr. Graves, one of the Brehon Law Commissioners, he deems it advisable to appoint another Gaelic scholar in his place, and so expedite the work of publication, and give confidence to all who feel interested in the due preparation of the volumes.

MR. HANBURY: The Glossary, which will form Volume 6 of the series, is nearly completed, and it is hoped that it will be ready for printing, together with Volume 5, by Christmas. No special steps are therefore necessary to expedite the work of publication.

IRISH TENANCY CONTRACTS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board for Ireland have yet obtained a test case to determine the question as to whether contracts of tenancy are to disqualify persons from being members of district councils whose tenants they are; and, if not, whether steps will be taken to settle the matter by a decision of the higher courts.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The Local Government Board have taken proceedings in a case where a rural district councillor was a tenant of a labourer's cottage, but as the magistrates convicted and imposed a nominal fine the case did not come before the higher courts. The magistrates' decision in this case was communicated by circular to all rural district councils. The Board have instructed their solicitors to endeavour to obtain a test case to decide the question in the higher courts.

MEATH COUNTY COUNCIL.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now state why the county Meath was not allowed to adopt the Staffordshire bye-law as to resignation of members of the county council.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am not aware whether the Staffordshire bye-law requires confirmation by any Government Department. The County Meath bye-law, in the opinion of the Irish law officers, was ultra vires.

FISHGUARD AND ROSSLARE RAILWAYS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state what steps have been taken by the Fishguard and Rosslare Railways and Harbour Company to carry out the undertaking embodied in their agreement with the Treasury of the year 1898 to construct a direct line of railway between Cork and Fermoy; and whether a contract for the construction of the line has yet been entered into; and when work on the line is likely to be commenced.

MR. HANBURY: No steps have been taken towards the construction of this portion of the company's undertaking, and no contract has been entered into. No portion whatever of the proposed Treasury grant of £93,000 will be paid until at least half of each line (that from Fermoy to Cork, as well as that from Rosslare to Waterford) is completed, and the grant as a whole is dependent upon the whole work being completed before 1st August, 1904. The £93,000 payable to the Treasury by the company has been allowed to remain outstanding at a low rate of interest; but in view of the apparent reluctance to begin the Fermoy and Cork portion of the undertaking I propose to require the immediate payment of this sum, unless satisfactory assurance is at once given that the Fermoy and Cork branch will be undertaken without further delay and completed before August, 1904.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Has any portion of the line been surveyed?

MR. HANBURY: I have no information beyond that I have given.

SUTTON TO CENSURE RAILWAY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that the Great Northern Railway Company have, without legal authority, removed the fence of the public road from Sutton to Censure, and constructed a railway partly on its site and partly on private land, and raised over a foot above the public road, but unfenced therefrom; and whether, seeing that the only power enjoyed by the company in regard to the highway between these points is, under their Act of 1897, to make a tramway along the public road and with the rails level with the road, the Irish Executive will take any steps for the public protection, and the vindication of the law affecting highways.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): Anything the Great Northern Railway Company have done they have done either at the suggestion or with the consent of the county surveyor, the officer of the road authority, and for the protection and convenience of the public. On the limited information in my possession it would undoubtedly appear to me that prima facie the provisions of the statute have not been strictly observed. I shall carefully consider all the facts.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has a County of Dublin grand jury power to suspend the law in Ireland?

[No answer was given.]

IRISH RAILWAY AMALGAMATION BILL.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the possibility of the Railway Amalgamation Bill now before Parliament, which would establish a railway monopoly over nearly three-fourths of the entire area of Ireland, becoming law, he can say whether the Government intend, and if so when, to create some tribunal, cheap and easy of access, in Ireland, other than the existing Railway and Canal Commissioners, to which Irish traders and passengers can appeal in causes of complaint in the matter of railway rates, fares, and facilities against railway companies; whether he can state what powers (if any) the Irish Department of Agriculture have to deal with such railway questions; and whether it is proposed to give to that Department the powers now possessed by the Railway and Canal Commissioners to deal with them, or in what other way the Government propose to meet the necessities of the case.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The answer to the first and third paragraphs of the question is that the passing of the Bill referred to by the hon. Gentleman will be accompanied by powers obviating the necessity for creating a tribunal dealing with the question as between the railway company and the public. The Department of Agriculture has power to appear on behalf of aggrieved persons before the Railway Commissioners, and to pay the cost out of their funds.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: What are the powers which the right hon. Gentleman says will obviate an appeal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid the hon. Member must give notice of that question. I have supplied all the information I have.

IRISH TENANTS AND POOR RATE DEDUCTIONS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether the Government propose to insert a clause in the Local Government (Ireland) Amendment Act to define the rights of tenants to deduct half the poor rate from the landlord, and also a regulation to separate the poor rate from other rates on demand note.

MR. ATKINSON: If the hon. Member will refer to the Bill he will observe that the matter is already sufficiently provided for.

POTATO CROP—EXPERIMENTS WITH ELECTRICAL CONDUCTORS.

MR. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland if he can state what are the results of the inquiry promised regarding certain experiments made by Mr. O'Sullivan, of Athea, County Limerick, in the improvement of the potato crop by the introduction of electricity through lightning conductors distributed through the crops by means of wires, by which it was stated that an increase of 80 per cent. was shown.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin County, S.): A Departmental inspector has visited Athea to make inquiry on this subject. The inspector reported that the experiments conducted last year by Mr. O'Sullivan to test the influence of electricity on the growth of potatoes were so limited in extent to warrant conclusive deductions. Similar experiments on a larger scale are, it is stated, in progress this year under Mr. O'Sullivan's direction, and will be watched with interest by the Department.

IRISH SCHOOL TEACHERS' BONUS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether teachers of the National schools (Ireland) who, under the old regulations, were entitled to an annual bonus, will get credit for these amounts when the new salaries under the new rules are being fixed.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Existing teachers who have hitherto been entitled to an annual bonus will get credit for the amount when the new salaries are being determined.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS' INCOME.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to a memorandum as to provisional payments of income to teachers of National schools issued in June last by the National Education Board, Ireland, in which a section of paragraph 5 laid down that if a teacher's results period did not usually terminate till the 31st May, he would be paid as the June quarter's remittance (a) £20, the equivalent of twelve months results fees, etc.; (b) two months salary, etc., up to the 31st May, 1900, at the old rate, equal to £13 6s. 8d.; and

(c) one month's consolidated income from the 1st June, 1900, namely, £8 6s. 8d., or a total sum of £41 13s. 4d. would be remitted to him; and in the event of items (b) and (c) having been remitted in such cases and item (a) withheld, can he say why, and whether item (a) will be made good to the teachers.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The promises contained in the memorandum referred to are being fully carried out. Payments under (a) take a little longer time to determine than those under (b) and (c), but all such amounts falling due in the June quarter will have been discharged about the close of the current month.

TEACHERS IN POOR LAW SCHOOLS.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say what steps it is proposed to take to safeguard the interests of the teachers in contributory unions in view of the fact that the direct grant, now to be included in the Education Estimates, is considerably less than the results hitherto paid by these unions.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: For the future, existing teachers of National schools in unions that have hitherto been contributory will have included in their income from State sources the moneys voted by the unions. In the case of future teachers no disparity will exist.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state definitely what arrangements will be made to secure that National teachers in workhouses will suffer no loss from the abolition of result fees, and that an allowance will be made to them corresponding in amount to that hitherto allowed by the guardians for result fees.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I do not think I can add to the statement already made by me in answer to the previous question of the hon. Member, namely, that it will be open to the guardians to pay to teachers in workhouse schools a bonus equivalent to the average of the results fees for the last three years after each examination, if the report of the inspector upon the school be in every respect satisfactory.

CANADIAN EXPORTS TO GERMANY.

GENERAL LAURIE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, seeing that the Tariff Law passed by the German Reichstag, pending the negotiations for the Commercial Treaty with the British Empire, specially excluded Canada and Barbados from the most-favoured-nation treatment for their products, on the grounds that Canada and Barbados had specially given preferential advantages under their tariff laws to the British Empire, and had not admitted other countries to these advantages; whether he is aware that this discrimination against the products of Canada, which was enacted because Canada had, as above stated, discriminated in favour of the mother country, has diminished the importation of Canadian products into Germany; and whether there is any intention to offer her any compensating advantages in trade.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no accurate information as regards the grounds on which the Government have taken action, nor as to the effect of that action on the imports from Canada to Germany. As regards the last paragraph of the question, my hon. friend is probably aware that the exports of Canada to this country are already free.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Perhaps the Leader of the House will tell us what will be the business next week, and I would specially ask him whether the Report of the Colonial Office Vote will be taken at such a time as will permit of further discussion. Yesterday we had a short discussion, which was closed, and there was no opportunity for detailed inquiries which Members desired to make.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that yesterday's was a short discussion. It lasted until half-past seven o'clock, as the House knows, and was nearly as long as it would have been on the night I intended to set apart for the Vote, though on an appeal from the right hon. Gentleman I transferred the discussion to a Wednesday.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I merely mentioned that it was closed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought there was some undercurrent of objection. As regards the Report stage of the Vote, there is one opportunity on which the Report of Votes can be taken at an early hour—the last day of Supply. The Government have no views as to how that day up to ten o'clock should be allocated, and I would certainly regard what may be any general wish. On Monday next the first business will be the resolution to introduce the financial proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not know whether the House would desire to take a general discussion at that stage or to defer it until the Second Reading stage. For various reasons I think it would be more convenient to defer discussion until the Second Reading, because I am anxious to proceed with the Companies Bill on Monday.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement be made by resolution in Committee of Ways and Means?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I have a very important notice down on the motion to go into Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was not aware of it, and I regret to hear it.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

MR. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection, That they had discharged the following Members from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures:—Mr. Brodie Hoare, Mr. Charles McArthur, and Sir James Woodhouse; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. Round, Mr. Kemp, and Mr. John Wilson (Durham).

MR. HALSEY further reported from the Committee, That they had discharged the following Members from the Standing Committee on Law and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure:—Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. H. S. Foster, Mr. Flower, and Mr. Yerburch; and had appointed in substitution: The Lord Advocate, Mr. Loder, Colonel Milward, and Viscount Cranborne.

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS.

Order for Committee read.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The statement I propose to make to the House, as those acquainted with the finances of India are aware, covers a period of three years, and the period with which I have to deal commences with April, 1898, and terminates in April, 1901. In two out of those three years a drought of unparalleled dimensions, intensity and duration has upset the normal finances of the year, and inflicted terrible sufferings on a large portion of the population of India. I believe the House takes more interest in the cause of this abnormal affliction than in the ordinary prosaic comparisons between the revenue of different years. So I propose to devote a considerable part of my statement to describing the extent, progress, and future prospects of this terrible calamity. It is the practice in this country always to designate an affliction of this kind by the word "famine." But I do not think that word, although perhaps it may be the best word in our language, quite accurately designates the primary cause of an affliction of this character, and certainly does not convey to those who read about famine all the consequential evils entailed by drought. As the House is aware, India is one of the most purely agricultural countries in the world. Eighty per cent. of the population are usually engaged in agriculture, and agriculture in India, as elsewhere, is dependent on rain. But rain only falls at certain periods, and during the rest of the year a condition of more or less heat prevails. If rain fails during the periods when it ordinarily falls drought obtains possession of the area not touched by rain, and not only is there a lamentable curtailment of food supply to those living in the localities where there is no rain, but all means of earning wages ceases. It is very difficult to bring home to those of us who live in a densely populated country like Great Britain, where occupations are so diversified and varied and independent of climatic conditions, what terrible industrial paralysis the failure of the monsoon causes to those districts in India which are not adequately watered. The supply of food is almost the least of the difficulties with which the Indian Government have to contend. There is always a sufficiency of food in the great continent of India, even in years of drought. Owing to the increase of communication and the development of railway enterprise that food can with greater ease be carried to the districts which are distressed. The real difficulty is that of distribution and the supervision of distribution. Cattle are the only means of transport in rural India. In a period of drought vegetation ceases and cattle die. The number of officials at the disposal of the Indian Government is limited, and it is absolutely impossible to organise a system of supervision of distribution which would enable food to be brought to the multitudinous villages, and consequently it becomes necessary to take people from their villages and aggregate them in various places where supervision may be exercised and distribution of food may be made effective. Therefore the House should bear in mind that when a calamity of this kind occurs it is not merely that people are deprived of their crops, but all means of earning a livelihood disappear, vegetation ceases, their cattle die, and to keep them alive it is necessary to have recourse to the dislocation of the whole system of village and agricultural communities in India. All these difficulties the people in the distressed districts have borne with consummate patience and resignation, and I am glad to say there has been a remarkable absence of crime throughout the great majority of these districts. The House may perhaps like to know what are the dimensions of the present famine. Taking the most accurate data we have of the last three serious droughts, we find that in 1876 the area affected was 205,000 square miles and the population 36,000,000. In 1896 the area affected was 275,000 square miles and the population 52,000,000. This year I am sorry to say the area affected beats the record. It is 420,000 square miles and contains 62,000,000 of people. I am sorry to say the intensity and duration of the drought within that area is greater than in preceding droughts. The number of people on relief works in the last great drought on 1st January was 636,000. This year on 1st January the number was 2,750,000. On 14th July, in the last drought, the number in receipt of relief was 3,300,000; the number at the same time this year was 6,100,000. Now if we dismiss temporarily from our minds the enormous aggregate mass of suffering, both physical and mental, that this affliction has imposed upon the localities it has touched, and look simply at the material loss which these localities have sustained, the figures assume most serious dimensions. It is very difficult to get accurate agricultural statistics as regards the edible crops, because a large proportion is consumed in the districts producing them, but we have more accurate statistics relating to the great agricultural exports, and I take these as an illustration of the loss which the country has sustained, putting on one side all other considerations. The wheat crop in a normal year is estimated to amount in value to £21,000,000. This year I am informed it cannot be more than £10,000,000. There is a loss in that one particular crop of £14,000,000. The cotton industry employs a larger number of persons than any other industry except agriculture. I mean not only in the cultivation of cotton, but also in the processes of manufacture, and the cotton industry largely depends upon the supply of raw material from Indian sources. The value of the cotton crop in a normal year is £12,000,000. This year it cannot be more than £5,000,000. Another very lucrative crop is that of oil seeds. The average value of that crop is not less than £18,000,000. This year it has disappeared altogether outside the Northern Provinces. I am informed on reliable authority that the reduction in the harvest in Bombay cannot be put at less than £15,000,000, excluding the frightful loss in cattle. Notwithstanding these tremendous losses, so large is India, so variable is its climate, and so unfailing is the law of compensation—that which is to the detriment of one province being very often to the benefit of another—that if we had only had to deal with one year's drought, I should, from the financial point of view, have been able to lay before the House an eminently satisfactory statement. But I am sorry to say that the reports of the last few days have not been at all satisfactory as regards the position of the monsoon, and we cannot dismiss the possibility that there may be a partial failure of the monsoon this year. Before I deal with the accounts, I may perhaps point out to the House that they are now stated in sterling; previously they were stated in tens of rupees. In the time of the East India Company the rupee was converted at 1s. 10½d., but in 1857-58 the exchange value was altered to 2s., a most convenient figure, introducing an unauthorised kind of decimal coinage. In the course of time the rupee steadily fell in value, and the difference between the nominal and the actual value became so great that it became necessary to alter the form of the accounts, and we took to stating the transactions in tens of rupees. That practice continued for some little time, but as during the past two years the exchange value has scarcely varied from 1s. 4d. the Government in September last declared a gold standard in India, and we thought it a favourable opportunity to state all transactions in pounds sterling at the rate of 15 rupees to the pound. The first year I have to deal with is 1898-99. I estimated last year a surplus of £2,700,000; the actual surplus realised was £2,640,000. For the year 1899-1900 the Finance Minister estimated a surplus of £2,600,000. He anticipated a normal year and made no special provision for famine. During the year a very heavy expenditure has had to be incurred in connection with the famine, and very large remissions of revenue have also had to be made. These in the aggregate amount to very nearly £3,500,000. But the whole of that amount is not an additional charge against revenue. Every year there is included in the expenditure a certain sum which is allotted to famine. If no famine occurs, that money is used either in constructing protective famine works, or in reducing the debt. In the year in question £730,000 was so available, and that has been used for the purpose of direct famine relief. Therefore the amount of additional charge caused by the famine is only £2,631,000. That, of course, is a very large deduction from the original estimate, but I am glad to say that we have had certain windfalls, and certain branches of revenue show such an improvement that I have more than a corresponding balance to show on the other side. Army expenditure is much less in consequence of the European contingent which has gone to South Africa. The railways have given a very good return, nearly half a million in excess of the Estimate. Telegraphs also show a large increase, and the gain on revenue generally is nearly £1,400,000. Adding to this reductions in expenditure we get a gain on the Budget of last year of £2,870,000, and putting that against the loss caused by the famine, the first year of famine expenditure, after paying all expenses connected with the famine, closed with the substantial surplus of £2,800,000. That put us in a position of exceptional financial strength for dealing with the famine expenditure of this year. When, therefore, Mr. Dawkins had to balance the expenditure and the income for the year, he estimated that he might safely rely upon a normal monsoon for this year, a monsoon which would be adequate in its volume and effective in its distribution. Inasmuch as it was the west of India that was affected by this drought, parts which had not for a century known lack of rain, his estimate seemed to be a prudent one, and one upon which we thought we might safely rely. But I am sorry to say that during the past ten days the accounts of the behaviour of the monsoon have not been at all satisfactory, and I am afraid that we must contemplate a very considerable expenditure over and above that which the Indian Government estimated in March last. For this year, after all the expenditure and all the loss of revenue inflicted on the Government of India by drought, they thought they might rely on a surplus of £160,000. About eight days ago I got the revised account. The monsoon had then broken well, and the Indian Government thought it would not be necessary to make any much larger provision than they included in the original estimate, and they informed me that they thought the surplus for this year would be about £50,000. Now the monsoon was very late this year. In recent years the Meteorological Department have established a direct connection between the fall of rain in India and the height of the Nile flood in Egypt. For the last twenty years, when there has been a failure of rain in India, the Nile flood has been low. Last year the flood was one of the lowest on record, and the failure of the monsoon was exceptionally bad. This year the Nile flood was normal, and that inspires the hope that ultimately the monsoon will fulfil its normal course. But on Tuesday night I received a telegram from the Viceroy in which he stated that after consulting with the Finance Department, he had come to the conclusion that it would be necessary to provide for an additional £1,200,000 for famine relief and the remission of land revenues. So that, instead of a surplus of £160,000, a deficit of £826,000 is now contemplated. I will read a telegram from the Viceroy, which states the facts upon which this estimate of increased expenditure is based. It is dated Simla, 25th July, 9 a.m.—

"Since my famine telegram to you of 20th July, conditions have changed decidedly for worse. No rain has since fallen in the Punjab, Sind, or Gujerat; insignificant rain in North Western Provinces, Bombay, Deccan, and Rajputana. On West Coast ordinary monsoon current has failed, and there are no present indications of revival. It is, therefore, not impossible that we may be faced, at any rate in Gujerat, Kathiawar, Baroda, and South-West Rajputana, with a far more serious situation than has yet arisen, while should monsoon continue to hold off a large part of India may be in for a second consecutive year of famine."

"I am going down myself on Monday to Gujerat to spend a week in the distressed districts and personally inspect the state of affairs."

The Viceroy and Lord Northcote will consult together, and before the end of the week we shall no doubt have a further report of the state of affairs. I have now a telegram from the Governor of Bombay of the same date as the Viceroy's telegram, but despatched at 4.15 p.m. As he is much nearer to the distressed area, we may assume that this telegram is some twenty-four hours later than Lord Curzon's—

"Your telegram, 21st July. Rainfall has been generally sufficient for agricultural purposes in Surat and Southern Gujarat States. Some rain has fallen in part of Broach, where cotton sowing is being actively prosecuted; but more rain is urgently required in Kaira, Ahmedabad, Panch Mahals. Rain not sufficient for agricultural purposes except in a few places. Two-and-a-half inches of rain have fallen since yesterday, Godhra, Panch Mahals; one in several parts Ahmedabad; over half an inch in parts Kaira; rain sufficient in parts Baroda, adjoining Surat; no rain anywhere in Okhamandal division, Baroda; rainfall to date insufficient in the remainder of Baroda, where extensive failure of crop inevitable unless good rain falls in a few days."

The area most severely threatened is a part of Bombay known as Gujarat, the richest and most fertile of the provinces of Western India, and for 100 years it has not known what drought is. It is a great cattle-breeding district and a country where the people to a large extent live upon a milk diet. We have in that part of the country only four small collectorships, and these are exceedingly difficult to administer, because they are inhabited by a great number of the non-Aryan aboriginal tribes, who are not easy to manage in times of drought. They are surrounded by native territories, which have not the same supplies and efficiency of administration as in our territories, and they are liable to be flooded with fugitives from the distressed native territories. There are four districts, and in the first rain has fallen; in the others rain is required. The Governor of Bombay's telegram proceeds as follows—

"No rain worth mentioning has fallen in any of the districts of Kathiawar, excepting small area south-east, where also more rain is urgently needed. Cultivation at a standstill for want of rain in almost the whole province. No signs of rain. Season is far advanced for sowing jowar staple cereal, but bajri can be still mostly substituted for jowar. Still time for cotton. Cattle dying from starvation. Scarcity of water increasing day by day."

This refers to the northern portion of Gujarat, which has suffered exceptionally, and where the death-rate for June has increased by nearly one-half over the death-rate for May. As regards ways and means, I propose to raise a loan of £3,000,000. For some time past I have made arrangements for inviting applications, and these will be asked for on Friday next. It will be part of the unexpended balance of the borrowing powers which I obtained three years ago. I assumed at that time that the greater portion of it would be spent in the next two years; but our finances have been so good that I have still £9,000,000 unexpended. After consultation with my advisers, I am of opinion that I shall be able, with that and other resources, to meet any demands which the Viceroy or the Government of Bombay may make between now and the end of October. even assuming that the rainfall this year is a partial failure. If the rains are propitious the loan will cover the requirements for the whole financial year. But, of course, there may be difficulties. We may not be able to make available our existing credit; and in that case we shall appeal unhesitatingly to the British Treasury. I have always held that where life can be saved by expenditure the whole financial resources of the Indian Government must be utilised; and that if, owing to untoward circumstances, we are unable to utilise our credit, Her Majesty's Government will in that case come to her assistance.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): Will that be a free grant?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Member must not anticipate. In dealing with the complicated conditions of this famine it is impossible for me now to anticipate the exact shape which that assistance ought to take. My hon. friend is under the impression that the Indian Government have been somewhat curtailed in their expenditure by desire for economy. I have had a table prepared of the total amount which the famine has cost India, and of the ways and means which we have, without any financial embarrassment, been able to apply to meet this exceptional expenditure. There has been spent, or provision has been made for spending, £6,190,000 in direct relief. Remission of land revenue and other reductions amount to £3,473,000. Loans to Native States for the purpose of meeting the famine have been £2,347,000; and advances to individuals have amounted to £1,098,000. That is an aggregate disbursement on the part of the Indian Government of upwards of £13,100,000 sterling in two years. Nobody who realises the magnitude of these figures can say—as has been said in some quarters—that there has been an attempt to run this famine on the cheap. No demand of the Government of India or of Bombay has been refused; we have complied with every requisition, and shall continue to do so as long as the object is the saving of life. Let us see how far success or failure has attended our efforts. A very considerable portion of the area now affected by drought was similarly affected three years ago; and any one who did not very carefully study the consequences and effects of the Indian drought and famine would naturally suppose that the mortality would be higher in the districts which had been twice affected than in the districts affected for the first time. But, curiously enough, exactly the reverse is the case. In 1897 the Central Provinces, which suffered for the first time, were terribly afflicted by scarcity, and there was a heavy mortality. This year they have been even harder hit, and there is a larger proportion of the people on relief works. But, except for those districts where epidemics have broken out, the mortality has been low. The conclusion at which I have arrived from a careful study of the famine of 1896-97, and from my previous experience of the famine of 1874, is that the first essential of successful famine administration is to get the people to come in early to the relief works, when they are still in good physical condition. If that is done, then it is easy enough; but if, on the other hand, from various reasons, the people will not come on the relief works until the last stage of exhaustion and inanition, their vitality is so low that it is almost beyond the powers of the authorities to revive them. They bring with them the germs of disease, which they communicate to healthy persons who are engaged on these works. Almost all the criticisms which have been hostile to the administration of famine relief have been devoted to the conduct of famine affairs in the province of Gujerat, which has not been afflicted by famine or drought for nearly a hundred years. The mortality in Gujerat has been exceptionally high. It has been a source of the greatest solicitude to myself, Lord Northcote, and the Viceroy. I have been in almost daily communication with them on the subject, but it is exceedingly difficult to put your finger on any mistake or error which has been made. The expenditure per unit there on relief is higher than in any other part of Bombay. The works there are more numerous, and the number of additional officers drafted there is higher than in any other part of Bombay. The collection of the land revenue has been almost infinitesimal. Undoubtedly the result, so far as mortality is concerned, is not satisfactory. In the past whenever famine operations are over it has been the practice to appoint a commission of inquiry for the purpose of investigating the various methods adopted. We shall have recourse to this procedure when this famine is over, and I hope that the collection of facts and the expression of opinions may be of use to the officials of the locality in dealing with subsequent outbreaks. But the difficulties which the local officers have to contend with are enormous and almost indescribable. I saw a report of the origin of the terrible outbreak of Asiatic cholera which suddenly occurred at the capital of one of the provinces. An American gentleman, the editor of a newspaper, published an account of what he saw in the Times of India. For many years he had devoted himself to charitable work, and he was a very competent authority to express an opinion as to the enormous difficulties which the relief officers have from time to time to cope with. There was great distress in the native States, and it was necessary, therefore, that some works of a certain size should be put up for the purpose of giving employment. In the middle of April a large tank work was opened in Godhra to meet the case of thousands of starving people from the outlying districts outside our own administration. Here is the account which appeared in the Times of India, and perhaps the House will excuse me reading it, but I do so because it will enable hon. Members more fully to appreciate the almost insuperable difficulties which these officers had to contend with—

Lord G. Hamilton.

“The story of the cholera outbreak in Godhra is ancient history, but it is worth retelling. In the middle of April the big Kaulao tank work was opened in the immediate vicinity of Godhra town to meet the case of the thousands of starving people flocking in from the outlying districts. The rush to this upset all calculations, and by the 20th of the month over 11,000 were crowded on to a work intended for only half that number. The administrative machinery broke down under the strain. . . . The people came hungry and resourceless; and hungry and resourceless they had to remain. . . . The receding waters of the tank confined within a limited space an enormous number of fish, and, deprived of other food, the starving people threw themselves upon this unwholesome diet and washed it down with the foul and putrid fluid in the tank. A great rise in the mortality gave rise to suspicions of cholera, and on the 20th one case was detected. On the 21st there was a lull; on the 22nd the storm broke, and 200 dead bodies lay about the camp. The ensuing panic was indescribable. The people gathered up their loins and fled from the unseen terror."

It is a sad tragedy, but no one can blame the officers on the spot for not accurately forecasting the actual number of persons who flocked in from territories not our own. Although there was a terrible mortality among those receiving relief, it was not confined to them—

"The wife of Mr. Cooper, the superintendent of the work, was struck down, and since then both Mr. Cooper and his little child have fallen victims to the disease."

It is a sad incident, only typical, however, of what was going on in other districts. All over the distressed districts our officers are combating these great evils with the greatest courage, success, and patience. In proportion to their numbers many have fallen victims to death uncomplainingly, believing that their work was appreciated by those with whom they came in contact, and quite confident that their fellow-countrymen at home will not be harsh or unfair critics of their action. Of all the men who visited those works no one was so competent to express an opinion as Dr. Klopsch, the American gentleman to whom I have alluded. After a visit to those works he wrote a final letter to the newspapers, in which he gave expression to these views—

"The more I see of the stupendous Government relief undertaking, the less I feel competent to criticise. With the limited number of intelligent workers at the Government's disposal it is a marvel that so much is being accomplished, and on the whole so well done."

It has been pointed out by hon. Members that in their judgment my action is inconsistent, inasmuch as I appealed to the Lord Mayor and the public for funds to combat the famine, but at the same time

I have not asked the Imperial Treasury to give a grant for that purpose. Hon. Gentlemen who have not given a close study to the principles of famine administration in India say that the fact of appealing to the public shows that the task is beyond the control of the Government, and that if this is the case we should frankly say so and come for aid to the Imperial Government. Those criticisms imply a very limited knowledge of the methods and the machinery which we employ in connection with famine administration. Many years ago, when the organisation was not systematised for the purpose of dealing with famine, money was subscribed by the public. Practically it was applied to the same objects as Government disbursements, and the result was that there was a great deal of overlapping, and distress did not get the full benefit of the money which was raised for relief. In 1878 the celebrated Famine Commission was appointed, of which Sir Richard Strachey was chairman. It had one of the most difficult administrative tasks which was ever laid before any body of men. There is no permanent poor law in India at all; it does not exist. But India is subject to periodical visitations that contract and expand with extraordinary rapidity. At one time drought may cause temporary distress; a few weeks afterwards it may sweep the whole province and deprive the people of the means of obtaining food. What that Commission had to do was to improvise a system of poor relief so thorough and elastic that it could be applied to all these various phases of famine. They laid down elaborate regulations the principal of which was that the Government of India took upon itself the obligation of finding food for all and work for those who were unable to obtain it, and to supplement this system of relief by kitchen poor-houses and hospitals. In fact, they were to take upon themselves as regards relieving distress a higher and wider obligation than was ever undertaken by any civilised Government in Europe. If the Government of India took all these duties on itself, was there any sphere of action for private charity and benevolence? The Commission emphatically replied in the affirmative; but they said that if an appeal is made to the public that appeal must be an authorised appeal of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, and it must be arranged that every one subscribing will see that the money he gives is not in deduction of the Government aid, but in addition to it, and that the work of private charity shall be in clearly defined spheres of action, separate and distinct, and in addition to that which the Government undertakes. It is on that ground alone I appealed to the public, and not because we were unable to fulfil all the obligations we had undertaken of ourselves. It was because I wanted charity and benevolence to co-operate with us in that work that I appealed to the public, for in every country in the world such work is done by philanthropic co-operation. The object for which this money is asked is not work which the Government can undertake. There are four objects. First, to supplement the dole or the ration which the Government gives by special comforts in the shape of clothing or food. This is a work of discrimination, and it is impossible for the Government in the case of the enormous number of persons who come on the relief works to attempt that individual discrimination. The second object is to try and get together committees of all religious denominations, and through the instrumentality of these committees to get at the people who from caste and other reasons decline to participate in any system of public relief. The third object is to give special attention to orphans, and the last is to make advances to the cultivators of the soil to enable them to commence agricultural operations again. That last burden we have put on the shoulders of the Indian Government, because it seemed to us to be a proper and legitimate function for them to discharge, and we have practically, during the past year, devoted something like £1,100,000 to that purpose, relieving to that extent the charitable funds, and consequently enabling them to devote their attention exclusively to other objects. It is said that after all Indian Government aids and disbursements are regulated by the state of their finances, that India is poor, and that her poverty regulates the expenditure on famine, but what really regulates famine expenditure in India is the Famine Code. That Code makes provision for every conceivable contingency, and the two extreme principles upon which it is founded and which regulate its action are on the one hand that money should not be wasted, and that relief should be given in such a way as not to prevent the people going back to their normal occupations, and the second principle that wherever life can be saved by expenditure there expenditure is to be incurred. As far as the relief of famine in India is concerned, the whole financial resources, the whole administrative machinery, are at the disposal of those who are combating this terrible evil, and it is only in the event of our being unable to give effect to the regulations which we have deliberately laid down that we shall appeal for help or assistance elsewhere. May I just say a word to many hon. friends on both sides who, actuated by the most philanthropic motives, are desirous that the Imperial Government should, as an indication of sympathy and having regard to the safety of the people of India, contribute a large sum from the Imperial finances to help the Indian Government in their task? I quite admit that conditions may arise under which we may be brought face to face with facts which would necessitate such assistance on a large scale, but I for one have been brought up to believe that if you want to encourage effective economy in India, if you want to ensure financial reform, one of the primary conditions is that you must make Indian finance as far as possible independent and self-supporting. We live in a time when public expenditure is the fashion. There seems to be no class of expenditure to which a large portion of Members of the House are not ready to give their assent, and it is a very hard task when there is this craving for expenditure for the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England, with the taxpayer at his back, to stop this growth of expenditure and to prevent it advancing by leaps and bounds. There is no more unpopular and unpleasant task which any man can undertake than that of checking the demands so constantly falling upon him. In India there is just the same pressure; but if the Minister of Finance in India is consistent in trying to keep down expenditure, because he knows he must balance his income and expenditure, it is his duty to establish an equilibrium between the income and the disbursements of the Indian Government. It is nearly twenty-seven years ago since I first went to the India Office as Under-Secretary of State. My chief, who was the Financial Secretary at the India Office, was one of the ablest officials in the public service. We soon became friends, and we agreed on this, that the only hope of effective economy, the only hope of improving the financial system, was to make India independent and self-supporting. What inducement would the Finance Minister in India have to endeavour year after year to balance income and expenditure if he knew that there were a large number of Members in this House who were prepared to press the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give a large contribution to Indian finances. Therefore, if I have objected to and opposed premature proposals to the Imperial Exchequer it is not because I have not sympathy with the sufferings of the Indian people, but because I believe the course I have adopted is for the truest well-being of India. I feel that a sound system of finance is a convertible term for the improvement of the material and industrial products of the country. I believe that as soon as this cloud passes we shall be able to make considerable remissions of taxation and so to improve and ameliorate the general condition of the taxpayers. But I admit that this policy must be conditional upon the establishment between the Imperial Exchequer and the Indian Exchequer of an absolutely just principle as regards the apportionment of the charges in which the two Exchequers have a common interest, and that naturally brings me to the very elaborate Report, delivered after years of investigation, which Lord Welby's Commission have drawn up. In this House it is the fashion with a good many of my friends on both sides to accuse the representative of the India Office with taking an optimistic view of Indian finance. My facts and my figures are not the result of mere official optimism. We had a Commission consisting of men of the highest authority, who have spent their whole lives in examining questions of finance, and some of whom have been intimately associated with the Treasury here. What are their main statements? They say first that the financial machinery of the Indian Government is well organised and effectively controlled. Then they go on to say that though the growth of expenditure has exceeded the normal growth of revenue, this was mainly due to the increased cost of exchange due to the fall in value of the rupee, and that, except for this fall, a considerable reduction of taxation might have been looked for. They further say that during the past forty years the unproductive debt of India had been reduced 25 per cent., that the commercial services, the telegraphs and post-offices, were worked at a considerable profit, and that the railway and irrigation works, with their far-reaching benefits, entail but a very slight cost. And lastly they say that the apportionment of charge between the United Kingdom and India as regards matters in which they have a common interest has on the whole been equitable and fair. If, then, we take a more sanguine view than our critics, it is because we have our hand on the pulse of Indian finance. We know its vitality, and we are not unconscious of its weakness; but, as the Commissioners point out, if we can stop this fall in exchange, if we can in any way ensure anything like stability in exchange, I am perfectly positive it will be possible in future to make considerable reductions in taxation. Not only so, but you would offer the strongest inducements to capitalists in this country to make investments in India. It is often assumed in connection with this question of exchange that we have adopted a currency policy for the benefit of a few individuals. That was not the opinion of the chairman of the Commission. The question of exchange is indeed the key of the situation. If we can keep up present prices we not only hope to reduce taxation in India, but also to offer inducements to capitalists to invest in that country, thereby assisting its resources. The Commission suggests practically that a certain sum should be transferred from one Treasury to the other; and they assume that if this sum is so transferred, the arrangements between the two Governments will in future be practically equitable. Taking the proposals in their entirety, the amount which they propose should be transferred, and charged from one Treasury to the other, is £257,000. I have been in communication with the various Departments concerned, and with Lord Curzon. The Government wish to give the most favourable consideration to these proposals, and we hope that in the course of a few months we shall be able to make arrangements whereby a sum of £250,000, or thereabouts, shall be transferred as suggested, and India to that extent will be benefited. At the same time, I am bound to guard myself by saying that I do not necessarily bind myself to accept all the detailed proposals of the Commissioners. I naturally pass on from Lord Welby's Commission to the work we have done during the past year in connection with our object of establishing a gold standard associated with a limited gold currency.

What did the experts tell us? We always like to consult experts. I think it is often pleasant to hear them talk; but the real satisfaction is when a number of experts have irrevocably committed themselves to a proposition which subsequent events show to be wholly and utterly false. The experts on this occasion who were opposed to our policy all told us that we might be able to establish a gold standard by proclamation in India, but as to associating with that a gold currency or getting any amount of gold flowing into India it was an absurdity. The gold, they said, would gradually filter back by process of exchange or trade. It was absurd, so they alleged, to think that any sensible person would take to India gold which had an even exchange in value all over the world in order to exchange it for rupees whose monetary value decreased 40 per cent. when taken outside India. The famine, to which I have so frequently alluded, caused a great falling off in the export trade of India; war broke out in the Transvaal, the world was deprived of its largest source of gold supply, and in consequence of the war expenditure the price of money rose. I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that if the Committee of which the right hon. Gentleman was chairman could have foreseen that in the first year after they concluded their report conditions so unfavourable to the realisation of a gold standard and currency in India would have existed, they would not have wanted action to be taken until a normal state of things had been re-established. Yet, notwithstanding this rare combination of influences against us during the past year, so far from gold not going to India there has been a superabundance of gold there. I do not like to trouble the House needlessly with figures, but this is really so interesting a matter that perhaps I may be allowed to read a few. There is a very large note circulation in India, and a considerable portion of this note circulation is covered by Government securities, the remainder by coined metal, either rupees or gold. The rupee is valued in exchange at 1s. 4d., or at the rate of 15 rupees to the sovereign. In January, 1899, the note issues secured by metal were 15 crores 67 lakhs; against that was held silver, 15 crores 19 lakhs; gold, 48 lakhs. In October silver had fallen to 12 crores 36 lakhs, and gold had risen to nearly 5½ crores. In January this year silver had fallen to 6 crores 78 lakhs, and gold had risen to about 10½ crores. At the end of May, of the notes for 18½ crores secured by metal, only 4½ crores were represented by silver; 14½ representing gold. We were in consequence obliged to buy silver and coin it to exchange it for gold. We have been compelled to buy £1,900,000 of silver, sufficient to coin 440 lakhs. About 1,689 lakhs of rupees, or £11,200,000, have been added to the rupee circulation since 1st April, 1899. I think we shall have to watch very closely this addition to the currency, but still I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee on the singular success which has attended its recommendations. We have got over the initial difficulty of the currency reform, and I hope that with the exercise of patience and vigilance we shall in measurable time have accomplished the objects we have in view. Sir E. Law reports that there was a large profit on the coinage of the silver, and in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission, he proposes to appropriate that to a special reserve fund which will facilitate our currency operations. I am afraid I have detained the House a long time, but there are a great many Amendments on the Notice Paper, and no doubt I shall be able to deal in reply to them with various other subjects of interest. There is only one other item of expenditure on which I wish to say a word or two—Army expenditure. The cost of military equipment seems to me to have almost escaped the control of the different Governments of the civilised world. I often wonder whether the great military Powers when they forced all the men of their nations into arms foresaw the result which would follow. The result has been that there has been such a demand for the manufacture of arms and munitions of war that their manufacture has become a most profitable undertaking. In the old days Governments for the most part manufactured their own arms and munitions; now there are great syndicates for the purpose controlled by men of the highest scientific attainments and genius, great chemists, great financiers. All the modern processes of production and industrial organisation are combined for the purpose of making more deadly weapons with which men may kill one another. The whole resources of civilisation are ransacked to obtain more and more effective weapons of warfare. The result is that the improvements are so great that it almost involves a change every decade. No Government can stand aside and allow its army to be armed with weapons which are a few years old. To such an extent is the manufacture of arms pushed that it has destroyed the difference which used to exist between the barbarous and semi-barbarous and the civilised Powers. The civilised Powers used to keep back barbarism by the superiority of their arms and weapons, but now these great syndicates are prepared to provide barbarous nations with arms of the most modern type, provided they can pay for them. In these circumstances the Government of India have no option but to see that our men are equipped with the most modern weapons. An illustration of what has occurred may be found in China to-day. Our native army in India until recently was armed with the Martini rifle. We thought it necessary that they should have the more modern weapon, and we were able, with the assistance of the War Office, to arm a considerable portion of the native army early in this year with Enfields. Some of these troops are under orders to China; and had it not been for this increased expenditure this year, these troops would have been sent to China with less effective weapons than those possessed by the Chinese. I regret that we have to incur this expenditure, but it is inevitable. The sums which have been paid by the British Government on account of the contingents to South Africa and China will to a very large extent cover the expenditure. In certain quarters it is suggested that, because the Indian Government in exceptional circumstances have allowed a certain number of the troops of their establishment to go to South Africa and China, the Indian establishments must be in excess of the requirements. The emergency,

however, was in both cases altogether exceptional, and the Indian Government were perfectly justified under the circumstances in doing what they did. Because in abnormal circumstances we ran a risk, it is unreasonable to suppose that when affairs return to a normal condition we should still continue to run that risk. Therefore, I can hold out no hope whatever of a reduction of military expenditure. I think, if anything is done, we may have slightly to increase it. That is not due to any wish to extend our territory, or to adopt any aggressive policy. During the last year Lord Curzon has shown great energy and determination in seeing everything for himself; he has passed all along the frontier. Two principles have been laid down for the regulation of our North-West Frontier policy. One is the substitution of levies and local Militia for British Indian troops, and the other withdrawal from cantonments outside the administrative frontier. That policy has been vigorously followed by Lord Curzon. He has placed a local Militia on the frontier, and has withdrawn the troops from cantonments outside the frontier and concentrated them in convenient cantonments where they will be in readiness to go at very short notice to the relief of the local levies if required. Suggestions have been made to the Indian Government to construct a railway down the Khaibar Pass, and to place a British garrison at Kotal, but these views did not recommend themselves to Lord Curzon and myself, and the only railroad made is one to Jamrud, in our own territory. I cannot leave the Indian Army without alluding to the irreparable loss India has sustained by the death of two distinguished soldiers—Sir Donald Stewart and Sir William Lockhart. Sir Donald Stewart's military reputation is well known. He was for fifteen years past a member of the Council of the Secretary of State, and a shrewder or more sagacious adviser never had a seat on that Council, and with his unfailing sagacity and great patience, he was as good an adviser in financial, political, and administrative questions as he was in military questions. Sir William Lockhart was a born leader of men, and a man of immense force of character. He no doubt shortened his life by his devotion to duty, for he was undergoing a course of German baths when he was

I upon to take up the command of the in the Tirah campaign. He went at a moment's notice, and I fear the hardships he underwent so tired his health that he was never fully to recover. There is one characteristic about these two great

Both had rare powers of attracting native officers and natives who served them in such a way as to secure a complete confidence. There is her most distinguished Anglo-Indian officer, Lord Roberts, who possesses this characteristic to a superlative degree. have made enormous changes in India during the last ten years. Our Government is stronger and more solidified than as before that period. The material prosperity of a large section of the population has greatly increased, and our mechanism of government has so improved and developed that I think it may be claimed for it that it is the most unced and scientific system that India ever possessed. Yet sometimes I doubts whether our popularity has ceased. Sir, we have gone on improving our administration, we have moved up through various stages of administrative improvements, until administration at the present moment has reached highest point of development. This has been accomplished by a great deal of labour and ability, and I do not think too much credit can be given to those who have achieved it. have codified the laws and simplified procedure, and we have made uniform our methods of administration, but, looking at all these great improvements, can it be that they are as palatable to the people to whom they are applied as the older and cruder system? We have not been able to find with those who have administered the laws. They are fully up to the standard of those of earlier years in intelligence and sense of duty, but they do not get the opportunities which were afforded to the young men who formerly came out from here to serve in India for in life and usually spent their lives here, being placed, not infrequently, in the best positions in which they had to depend on their own resources for the preservation of law and order. That has gone. We have passed from the old patriarchal methods. The gentlemen who came out to India now are in a different position. Everybody has a code for everything, and if the code fails there is the telegraph by which he can get assistance at the earliest possible moment. But that is not the only evil from which civil servants in India suffer. They have everything that develops—telegraphs and railways—and the result is that they are so over-burdened with correspondence, Reports, and Returns, that they are really imprisoned in their offices for the greater part of the day, and it is only when such a great calamity as that with which India is now afflicted occurs and sweeps away all their stereotyped procedure that these men are able to come out of their offices and join with the other forces at work in dealing with the trouble. Then the sympathy of these men brooks no denial, and we see them come out and toil to ameliorate the condition of the sick and the poor. I hear from all sides in the distressed districts of India which are suffering such terrible loss that the work of these men has rekindled between the Government and the governed that feeling of regard and affection which was so marked a characteristic in India.

We have a remarkable man as Viceroy, a man of untiring energy and unbounded power of work, and he has devoted his energy to every branch of administration. His wish is so to free the official that he shall be able to get more time to give to the essentials of administration, and therefore I am hopeful that, although one cannot but deplore the mass of suffering and misery through which India is passing, and which may occur again in subsequent years—I sincerely hope and believe that the outcome of this misfortune will not be without its benefits to India, that the wounds and scars which this terrible calamity has inflicted may be forgotten, and that interchange of kindly feeling and mutual regard among all classes who have fought the common fight may be a lasting and increasing influence in guiding the future fortunes of India.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Lord G. Hamilton.)

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I am sure the House is greatly indebted to the noble Lord for the admirable statement he has made. I have been struck by the pathos, eloquence, and luminous exposition of detail which has characterised his masterly speech.

I think it will rank among the foremost statements of Indian finance that have been made to this House. The noble Lord has gone over the greater part of the ground over which it is usual to travel, and he has also dealt in a sympathetic manner with the great calamity from which India is suffering, and has brought before us the difficulties which he and his colleagues have had to face in this difficult situation. There are one or two points on which, perhaps, I do not quite agree with him and on which I may have to express my views in a few words, and beyond that I do not propose to trouble the House at any length. I should like, however, to add my testimony to the great loss India has sustained in the death of the great soldiers to which the noble Lord has referred. I was associated with Sir Donald Stewart when I was in office as Secretary of State, and I can state that not only was he one of the wisest of military advisers, but also one of the soundest financiers and most practical men in administration. We have sustained another loss this year, happily not occasioned by death. I deeply regret that one of the eminent civil servants to whom the administration of India has been entrusted has found himself compelled to deprive the Indian Government of his services—I refer to Mr. Dawkins, to whom the greater part of the credit for the reform of the Indian currency belongs. There were several figures given by the noble Lord which were interesting to the House, and one or two I should like to supplement. I quite admit that the Currency Commission did not anticipate the calamity that has fallen on the Empire of India during the last few months. I am sure that the members of that Commission would not have signed that Report and adopted so great a change if they had known that within a year we should be engaged in a war with South Africa, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have issued the largest loan since 1815, and that India would be suffering from a terrible famine. As far as we can see at present everything that has transpired since is encouraging as to the probable success of the currency policy. The noble Lord has told us how the unfavourable predictions have been falsified, but he has not told us the effect of this change upon trade. The House will remember the abnormal condition of trade as far as famine is concerned, and the state of things produced in the cotton trade as far as China is concerned. The total trade of India, in and out, was in 1898 105 millions; in 1899, 109 millions and a quarter; and in 1900, 115 millions and a quarter. So far as exports were concerned, in 1898 they were 56 millions; in 1899 65 millions; and in 1900 65 millions, notwithstanding that the export of wheat and rice was necessarily reduced by the diversion into the famine districts. I understand from the accounts that, on the 1st April, 1899, the currency of gold in reserve was two millions sterling, and on 7th March, 1900, seven millions sterling, and, in addition, the Secretary of State had accumulated in London a million and a half of gold. So the aggregate of gold under the control of the Secretary of State was eight millions and a half. Now, there must be in India a silver reserve. The noble Lord has had this year to buy silver. There is one factor it is impossible to pronounce accurately upon—the quantity of silver necessarily diverted into the famine districts, and that may disturb calculations. I understand the Indian Government intend to have a gold reserve of five millions. Beyond that, they propose to give gold in exchange for silver. The gold taken from currency in payment of notes is £130,700. I mention that as showing that the people are still pursuing the old habits of trade, and that the Report of the Committee that the great bulk of the internal transactions of India would continue to be carried on in silver is being borne out and the quantity of gold circulated is equally small. The gain is in the fixity of exchange between this country and India, and estimating the cost of a common denomination. I hope this great change which has marked the administration of the noble Lord will act most beneficially on the trade, commerce, taxation, and prosperity of India. As far as I can gather, a sum of money has evidently been exported from this country to India for investment in India. With reference to the famine I have nothing to add to the pathetic statement of the noble Lord, and his just expression of admiration of the manner in which the famine has been grappled with by the officials, and I hope the House will note what has been stated by the noble Lord and the Viceroy of India, that the actual cost to the Government of India—on the part of the people of India (that would have cost a great deal more)—in the last two years has been thirteen millions sterling, as an indication of the sound financial condition in which India stands. The Secretary of State makes this a strong argument for objecting to India being removed from Imperial funds. "India is able to meet its own requirements. We ought not to appeal to the Indian Exchequer to help us." I agree that an equilibrium should be maintained between income and expenditure, and I would oppose anything which would appear like the pauperisation of India. But the large excess of revenue out of which these large sums are being provided really means an excess of taxation levied beyond the actual requirements of the Indian Government in normal circumstances. In other words, if it had not been for this exceptional expenditure there must have been large reduction of taxation. That being so, I say we come to the point of voluntary contribution. There should be a payment made by Great Britain to her great dependency to help her in this great calamity. You may say India does not need it. But sympathy is a strong force in human affairs. Sentiment is a strong force in human affairs. We have recently received strong marks of sympathy from India and our colonies. There are two sides to this, and if we receive expressions of sympathy from India and the colonies we must be prepared in return to give expression of sympathy when the time arrives. A great Indian prince, the Maharaja of Gwalior, has recently offered to fit out a hospital ship for the use of the British Government in China. I suppose if that Indian prince had not come forward a hospital ship would not have been wanting, but throughout the length and breadth of the land this expression of sympathy from that great Indian prince to the mother country will be recognised and admired far more than its intrinsic value. If the Government had been prepared, not as a matter of dry finance, to say to India, "You are in financial difficulties, and we will relieve you," and the people of this country, through their representatives in Parliament, had said, "We will vote India a sum of money to aid her in her calamity as an expression of our national sympathy in addition to private charity," I believe that, as a matter of State policy, it would have been one of the wisest things the Imperial Government could have done. These perpetual appeals to the charitable section of the English public—I find no fault—are only responded to by a limited class, and the same class who give for the relief of the soldier, sailor, the suffering, and hospitals, whether in India or elsewhere. But there is a great mass of wealthy people in this country who give to nothing. It is only right and fair that they, deriving advantages from this great relationship between us and our colonies and India, should take their share, as part of the nation, in doing what I believe the nation would desire to have done. Whether the Secretary for India asks for a large or a small sum, and whether he terms it a loan without interest, or a grant, the handsomer, the more generous, and spontaneous it is, it will be better appreciated and approved by the people of this country, and will be accepted in the same spirit by the people of India. As to the proposals of Lord Welby's Commission, I think that the Report of that body has dispelled, and will dispel, a great many delusions which have taken hold of the popular mind in England and India with regard to our financial position there. That Commission was appointed with two objects. It was appointed to inquire into the administration and management of the military and civil expenditure of India, both at home and in India, and into the apportionment of the charge between the Imperial and the Indian Governments for purposes in which both Governments are interested. That Commission sat for two or three years and took the opportunity of ascertaining from the best authorities what were the facts of the case. I think the facts are stated in the Report with singular accuracy, clearness, and fairness, and for many years to come the various details of Indian finance will have there an authorised text-book. I have no fault to find with the facts which the Commission found as a jury. I am bound to say that I think the Commission have been very timid in their recommendations. There are some of their recommendations which I am glad to hear the noble Lord does not intend to accept. I am very sorry that they were not unanimous with reference to the audit. There was a very strong weight of opinion that though the present audit was very admirable, still it was desirable that the Comptroller and Auditor General in India should be put in the same position as the Comptroller and Auditor General in this country, and should be absolutely independent of the Executive. The only ground of objection I can trace was the very familiar one, "Oh, it would cost too much; it is not worth the expense." I think it is worth the expense. The last estimate I have seen of the cost of an independent audit in India puts the figure at £15,000 a year. I do not think that is a sum worth saving on a question of this magnitude. There is another point with reference to the position of the Finance Minister in the Indian Council. At present there are two military members in that body. I think the Commander-in-Chief ought to be removed, just as the Commander-in-Chief here is from the English Cabinet. That is a subject which I hope the Government will very carefully consider. The question of the debt of India is one upon which we have often had discussions in this House. Some gentleman sent me a book this week in which he stated that, while the English debt had been reduced by something like £140,000,000 since the Crimean War, the debt of India during that time had steadily increased. This is from a very respected author, and I am sure he would not make a misrepresentation. But he did not divide the debt into productive and non-productive debt. There is the ordinary debt which every State must incur, and there is the public works debt, which pays its own interest and repays its own capital. At the close of the Mutiny the ordinary debt of India stood at £97,000,000. In 1897 that had been reduced to £72,750,000. The noble Lord's Memorandum puts it in the clearest way, and it shows that now the entire debt of India, productive and non-productive, is £212,000,000. The assets which India has in the shape of railways, canals, irrigation works, money lent to corporations, and other valuable assets, is £182,000,000. The net debt of India at this moment, after having gone through this terrible famine, is £30,000,000. I do not believe there is any great civilised Government in the world where there is proportionally so small a debt as there is in India at the present time. This Commission has also found that the civil expenditure is not excessive as compared with 1875, and that it has not been excessive as compared with the expenditure of other countries, and that although there has been a net increase of 25 per cent., yet there has been an increase in the population of 20 per cent. I hope the Government will take into its most careful consideration the various recommendations of the Commission, and even if they do not agree with them they should settle some of the questions once and for all. I do not think the Treasury has done what it ought to have done in the proposal now suggested as the financial settlement. I do not think £250,000 a year does adequately meet the claims of India. I think there is a greater claim, not upon the charity, but upon the justice of the people of this country, with reference to military charges. It has been proved, and the noble Lord's speech shows it, that a great portion of your military reserve is in India. You had to have recourse to India with reference both to South Africa and to China. I have no wish that India should in any way profit by the transaction, but, looking at it as a whole judicially and fairly, I think that the contribution from India to what is called the capitation grant is too high. I express again my thanks to the noble Lord, and I re-echo his hope in regard to the somewhat gloomy view of the Viceroy on Tuesday, which is certainly modified by the telegram on Wednesday from Lord Northcote, and of course Bombay is a most important district. We are at present in July, and I think August is an important month in the history of the monsoon, and I hope the situation may not prove to be so gloomy as it is at present anticipated; but whether that be so or not, I think we shall not forget, India will not forget, and history will not forget the admirable manner in which the British Government in India and the officials of the British Government have grappled with this calamity with a success which has no parallel in the history of India.

MR. SOUTTAR (Dumfriesshire): The speeches to which I have had the pleasure of listening have encouraged me the more earnestly to say that which I have to say. The speech of my right hon. friend was, of course, a direct encouragement, and the speech of the noble Lord who repre-

India in this House was also an encouragement of no mean order, for he told us three things. In the first place, he warned us that the danger was by no means at an end; in the second place, by the figures he laid before the House, he distinctly showed that, although the Government of India had been exceedingly generous as far as its power went, it had been unable to do more than meet a small proportion of the great loss which the country had experienced; and in the third place, if I may say so, he showed that his heart is not entirely closed and sealed against the proposition which I have to make. In making that proposition, I ought to explain that I have been advised that it is not in order for any private Member to propose that a definite sum should be granted from the Exchequer, and perhaps, instead of saying anything about a definite sum, if I substitute the words "a large and generous grant," and ask hon. Members to bear in mind that £5,000,000 is the amount I have in my mind, that will sufficiently meet the case. But before I proceed to say anything about that, I should like to be permitted, partly from my own personal knowledge of India, and partly from what I heard lately, to say how immensely everyone, so far as I know, on this side of the House appreciates the efforts made by the Government of India in connection with this famine. From the Viceroy down to the humblest official, both natives and Europeans, they have done their very utmost, as far as in them lay and as far as they had the power, to mitigate the great calamity which has befallen India. Of that there is not the slightest doubt, and concerning that there is no difference of opinion. One thing sometimes strikes me as rather strange, and I daresay other Members have thought the same, and that is, that in a country where so many men are working with extraordinary earnestness on behalf of the people, there should yet be such continued suffering. In the old days you could account for these things by saying that they were the product of war and misrule, but there has been no war within the frontiers of India for forty years, and during that time there have been ten famines, and 15,000,000 people have died of famine and of the diseases connected with famine. This famine is the worst of all. The noble Lord has given us extraordinary figures showing that this is a famine of no ordinary degree. It is perfectly impossible to really appreciate the meaning of these figures. The more one studies them the more one feels that perhaps in the history of the world there has never been a famine like the one we are considering to-night. Moreover, this famine is the greater because it has so soon followed the famine of 1897. Many of the natives of India, I think, were only able to gather one meagre crop after that famine had passed before this second famine was upon them. I mention that, not for the sake of letting Members see what a big famine it is, but because I wish to impress upon their minds this circumstance, that this is an extraordinary famine, that therefore the occasion is an extraordinary occasion, and that the grant made in connection with this famine need not for a single moment be regarded as a precedent in connection with any future famine. The question is, Is there such an emergency as to need a considerable grant? I think there is; and for two very clear reasons. In the first place, I think the people have got to the end of their resources. Their ornaments are gone, their clothing is gone, their furniture is gone, and the very fittings of their houses have been sold in order to keep bare life within their bodies. Not only that, but this famine, which has been a famine of food and fodder and water, has swept away almost entirely the plough cattle of the people, and there they stand facing the future in perfect misery and hopeless despair. That is a very serious consideration. Here we have millions of people practically bankrupt, their cattle gone, their credit gone, having no hope in the present, and very little hope with regard to the future. But I think we may go further and say that we can prove emergency from the circumstance that the Government have got to the end of their resources. The noble Lord, in speaking of the resources of the Government, said he had yet borrowing powers to the extent of £9,000,000. I suppose, as a matter of fact, having the whole credit of the British name behind him, he has borrowing powers for £90,000,000 if he is so disposed, but surely borrowing is not the way to meet a great difficulty like this. Surely the noble Lord will not contend that the people of India should in that way be plunged yet more heavily into debt. Moreover, it becomes more serious when you consider, as my right hon. friend has pointed out with great clearness, that the Government of India is the people of India. In this country you might possibly establish a tax by which you could raise a certain amount of money, the incidence of the tax falling at first on the wealthy people of the land—such a tax as the income tax. You could not do that in India, because the revenue is received from salt and land, and everyone who knows India knows that to pay more money as interest on loans, or anything else, is only to burden more seriously the miserably poor in order to help those who are yet more miserable. If we desire to see the exact condition of India we have only to look at the words in one of the paragraphs of the Viceroy's appeal. He says—

"If the question be asked, Why is Government not able to assume the entire burden, and to dispense with all external aid? no false pride need deter me from giving a frank reply. Government is straining every nerve, is pouring out its money, is shrinking from no obligation, however severe. . . . But over and above this expenditure, which cripples our development in a score of ways, there lies a vast area of need which, do what we may, we can barely reach, and in which extraneous contributions supply an invaluable reinforcement. . . . This is a field of enormous and almost undiscoverable extent, the margin of which the already overworked official hardly touches, but which is, in a peculiar and inevitable degree, the property of individual effort and private generosity."

No words I can utter are likely to carry more conviction than those of the Viceroy. He tells us that the Government are straining every nerve, and that yet there is an enormous field of almost undiscoverable extent, the very margin of which is scarcely touched. The Viceroy's appeal has produced an altogether inadequate result, and that field will remain untouched until the British Parliament rises to a sense of its duty, and steps forward to do its part. Seeing the need of India, let me give one or two simple reasons why I think we should help her in her hour of need. The first is a somewhat selfish but a very forcible reason. India is the fourth best customer we have in the whole world as a commercial nation. The United States comes first, then France, then Germany, and then India. In a very little while India will be our second best customer. She is already a better customer to us than the whole of Australasia, and in a little while, if the present rate of progress continues, she will be a better customer than the whole of our colonies put together. In ordinary business life, if a business man in a large way has a customer a little embarrassed for the moment, he does not crush that customer; he does his very utmost to help him. He remembers what he has made out of that customer in the past; he thinks of what he hopes to make in the future, and he does his best to help the lame dog over the stile. We have made a great deal out of India in the past; we hope to make a great deal out of her in the future; and we ought therefore to come forward and help her in this hour of trial. But there is a higher reason than that why we should help India. Notice has already been taken of what India has done for us in connection with foreign affairs. In our embarrassments in South Africa, in China, and on the West Coast of Africa, who has come forward to help us loyally, if not India? Indian troops were, I believe, the first to face the enemy in South Africa; they will be the first in any number to face the enemy in China. India has lent 22,000 troops to her Suzerain, and she may lend a great many more. Have hon. Members ever reflected what would have been the case to-day if India had been disloyal? Have they ever reflected what might be the case if some day India should be disloyal? You cannot make a country loyal in a day; but you can gradually make a country loyal by good government, by a display of good feeling, and by acts of kindly generosity. I have lived for years in India, and I do not hesitate to say as my deliberate conviction that the Indians are the most grateful people on the face of the earth. If we would only rise to the occasion and make this grant—which we should never miss—I believe we should make India loyal for half a century to come. Fathers would tell their sons of the time when famine and pestilence walked hand in hand throughout the land, when the seed corn had passed away, when the plough cattle had died, and when apparently nothing remained for the people but to die; and then at that time England came forward with a great gift for new seed corn and for new plough cattle, and saved the lives of the people, and brought back happiness and contentment to the homesteads. There is one other reason I should like to give, and that is that India has cost us nothing in the past. We have heard the noble Lord speaking about the necessity of teaching India good finance, showing India a good example, and teaching her economy, and so on. There was not a word in regard to that with which we would not all agree, and yet at the same time the thought came that he was speaking as if India needed to learn that lesson. Nothing of the sort. India has cost this country practically nothing. Our colonies have cost us hundreds of millions of pounds; India has never cost us a penny. The British Empire in India was founded, and has been extended and consolidated, by Indian resources, and the British taxpayer has never been asked to contribute a single shilling. But beyond that, India costs us nothing at the present. Just consider the contrast for a moment between the Colonial Office and the India Office. We know how difficult it is to get up a debate in this House on any Indian subject. Why is that so? Because the expenses of the India Office, from the salary of the noble Lord down to the wages of the meanest employee in the office, are borne by the Indian peasant, and do not come before this House. We have no such difficulty with regard to the Colonial Office, because the salary of the Colonial Secretary, and the great expenses of that Department, are borne absolutely by the British taxpayer. If you look at the thing more broadly, it becomes even more striking still. The noble Lord at the head of the Government made a very remarkable speech a few days ago in which were words of very solid wisdom. He spoke of the burdens of empire, and showed that those burdens might have to be more evenly divided than at present.* I entirely agree, if I may be permitted to say so, with the doctrine he preached; but when that day comes India will have nothing to fear, as she already pays her full share. Every penny that can possibly be put upon India is put upon her to-day. The colonies subscribe in all one and a half millions towards Imperial defence, whereas India subscribes from twenty-two to twenty-five millions. Above and beyond that, India has been burdened with the expense of many wars; she has had to bear the expense of wars, either wholly or in part, to which the colonies have not contributed a single shilling.

Our richest colonies have been spared, but the poorest and most miserable peasantry in the world have been taxed not only for their own welfare but also to preserve the name and reputation of our great Empire in portions of two continents. The noble Lord indicated that it is quite possible that the colonies have been treated with generosity while India has been treated with strict justice. Surely that is an argument in favour of helping India to-day. If India has stood shoulder to shoulder with us in our times of trial, if she has borne the heat and burden of the day, surely it is right that we should stand shoulder to shoulder with India now that her great day of trial has come. I might contend that strict justice demands that we should help India. My right hon. friend went into that point, and I will not carry it any further. There are men in this House who understand these things a great deal better than I do, but my superficial judgment on the Report of the Royal Commission is that this is an act not of mere generosity but of absolute justice and equity. I believe the British Empire owes a debt to the Indian peasant of which these millions would be but a payment on account. Finally, it seems to me that our national dignity is indissolubly bound up in giving help to India at this time. We have made ourselves responsible in a very striking degree for the government of India. We hold in India 300,000,000 of our fellow-creatures in the hollow of our hand; we govern them just as we like, without even asking the opinion of the natives of India. Of course, we are not responsible for this famine; it is the act of God; but surely the position we have taken up in regard to India makes it absolutely necessary that we should, by every means in our power, mitigate the calamity which has come upon the people. We have vaunted the Government of India; we have said to the nations of the world, "Come and see how Englishmen can govern Orientals," and it seems to me that the miseries of our fellow-subjects in India to-day touch our honour, and are a blot upon the fair fame of our Empire. The appeal of the Viceroy has gone throughout the length and breadth of the world; the whole world is therefore looking at us and wondering how we will act, and the strange thing is that this House has not yet granted even a £5 note towards the Famine Relief Fund. If the noble Lord is obdurate, and this proposal is cast aside, it may be that we shall have to record that the greatest famine of the nineteenth century was allowed to eat its way through the country without any help being given to the people from the legislative assembly of the greatest and richest Empire the world has ever seen. Surely such a conclusion would be to our everlasting shame. I cannot believe that the Government mean to put such an affront upon the nation. Rather do I believe that they will fall in with what I know to be the desire of the House and of the country at large, and make a generous gift to the Indian people out of the fulness of our abounding wealth, to strengthen the hands of an admirable Viceroy, and to gladden the hearts of a greatly suffering people. I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to second the motion, and I trust that the House will favourably consider this appeal to its pity. When the proposal for a Parliamentary free grant was discussed last April,* it was received with favour by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but the Government did not then see its way to take any action. The First Lord of the Treasury recognised the terrible distress of India, and was prepared, if needful, to apply without hesitation to Parliament for assistance, but he did not accede to our request, as the Government of India did not then anticipate difficulty in providing relief. It will be seen that this refusal was conditional; and I submit that since April things in India have become much worse, and that the time has come to reconsider the original decision. I hope also that when I make clear the purpose for which we ask the grant the objection taken by the First Lord may in some measure be removed. He pointed out that the Indian revenues sufficed to provide the relief undertaken by the Indian Government. We quite understand that; and we do not propose that the Parliamentary grant should go as an addition to the Indian revenues. On the contrary, we wish the Parliamentary grant to go to the famine-stricken people by way of charity in ways altogether outside the scope of ordinary Government relief. Our object will become clear if the House will consider the Famine Code rules, which distinguish by a broad line between the relief functions of the Indian Government, on the one hand, and the functions of charity on the other. These rules were summarised in a Memorandum sent last April by the Secretary of State to the Lord Mayor, at the time the Mansion House Fund was opened. In this Memorandum the noble Lord stated first the duties undertaken by Government. He said that "the Government undertakes to prevent death, and to relieve misery from famine in British India, at the cost of the Indian Treasury, so far as organisation and effort can accomplish these ends." And he then proceeded to specify the four purposes for which charity was required. These were (1) extra comforts in the shape of food and clothing, (2) the maintenance of orphans, (3) the relief of specially helpless classes, and (4) the provision of cattle, seed-corn, and implements to enable the cultivators to make a fresh start. This division of labour was in accordance with the recommendations of the Famine Commissioners, the functions of the Government being limited to the preservation of life and health; while charity was expected to supplement this work in certain exceptional cases, devoting itself principally to the duty of giving the cultivators a fresh start in life. Now in 1897 the charitable contributions were very large, so that no less a sum than three quarters of a million sterling could be allotted out of the Charity Fund for cattle, seed grain, and implements. It thus resulted that in 1897 the duties undertaken by Government, and the duties undertaken by charity, were both sufficiently fulfilled. But this unhappily is not the case in 1900. As regards the duties undertaken by Government, we know, from the assurance of the First Lord, that the Indian Government have the necessary funds, and no help is required. But as regards the relief dependent upon charity the resources are altogether insufficient, and it is here that special and exceptional help is required most urgently. I would specially invite the attention of the House to the almost despairing appeal made by Lord Curzon to the world's charity on the 28th of May. In that appeal he pointed out how vastly greater the present famine is than that of 1897, both in extent and intensity, while up to date only about half the amount previously subscribed had come in. This cry for help has been answered from many quarters of the globe—from our own colonies, some of whom have voted Parliamentary grants, from the United States, from the Emperor of Germany, even from the mandarins of China, and the Sultan of Turkey. Under these circumstances it does not seem fitting that this Parliament, which represents the richest community in the world, should stand aloof and refuse a contribution proportioned to the wealth of this country and its responsibility for the welfare of the Indian people. As far as I can judge, there is in the country no unwillingness to make this free grant. On the contrary, expressions of public opinion seem all to be in its favour; and I brought specially to the notice of the noble Lord the memorial in support of a free grant from so important a public body as the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce. As regards the purposes of this free gift, I would repeat that we do not desire it to be used in support of the general finances of India. It should be placed at the disposal of the Viceroy, to be utilised, according to the local needs of the suffering provinces, in helping the prostrate cultivators to their feet, and giving them a chance of regaining their normal condition. The excessive need in the present case has arisen from the wholesale destruction of plough and milch cattle by the drought, the loss amounting to 80 and 90 per cent. in some districts. Without plough cattle the cultivators cannot take advantage of the rains now falling; and so pressing is the need that the Government of India is making advances to the cultivators for this purpose exceeding a million sterling. But this relief will only be partial and temporary, for those loans are only made to those who can give security, and, as they must be repaid, the object of giving the cultivators a fresh start will not be accomplished. What is wanted is a free gift of cattle, seed, and implements, to all who desire to return to their village homes and regain their old position of skilful and industrious peasants. The noble Lord has told the House how devotedly the officials in India have worked, high and low. I desire respectfully to associate myself in appreciating the noble work that has been done, and would specially mention that from all parts of India communications reach me expressing deep gratitude to his Excellency the Viceroy for his personal exertions. And I would ask whether this House would not be fitly recognising these exertions by placing at Lord Curzon's disposal funds which will enable him to deal promptly and effectually with the misery by which he is surrounded. I see it announced that he is about to visit Gujerat, which is probably the most sorely afflicted province in India; and if the House will bear with me I will read a short extract describing the condition of the people there, as seen by Mr. Vaughan Nash, the special correspondent of the Manchester Guardian—

“When I look back on the scenes through which I have passed and think of the sum total of human misery, and the despair I have seen on people's faces, and the ruin this famine has brought on their homes and fields and on their families, I feel it is hopeless to attempt to put into words the agony of India. You see these simple childlike races, devoted to their homes and their children, made outcasts by the famine and forced to abandon their customs and leave their homes to get a little bread by labour at stone-breaking or earth-carrying. Most poignant of all in the appeal it made to me was the silence and submission with which they bear their trials. In the hospital sheds, where you pick your way between the rows of dying, or out in the burning sun, where mothers are hammering stones with one hand and hugging a child with the other, you rarely hear a complaint. Even the gift of tears seems to have dried up, except among the children, whom you see crying sometimes by the side of a sick mother. Those who know India may be able to tell you what spirit it is that looks out from the eyes of these miserables, broken and quenched as they are, and which keeps them dignified and composed in surroundings that are degrading and horrifying. It seemed to me to be the spirit of a noble people, who had won refinement and discipline when our own forefathers were savages, a people we may well be glad to succour and proud to rule, looking out at the wreck of all things, seeing their gods, their homes, their country shrivelling to dust and ashes.”

No words of mine will add to the pathos of this description. But in asking hon. Members to take a merciful view of the present appeal I would remind them that the famine in India is essentially a famine of money, not of food, and that, on an average three-halfpence a day is sufficient to keep these poor people from the pangs of death by hunger. I beg to second the motion of my hon. friend.

Amendment proposed—

“To leave out from the word ‘That,’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘looking to the special needs of the famine-stricken people in India at the present time, this House recognises that funds are urgently required to feed, clothe, and house the cultivators in their villages until their crops are ripe; to provide them with plough cattle, seed, and other requisites of cultivation; and to restore them to their normal economic condition; that these requirements cannot be adequately met from Indian revenues raised from the suffering Indian people, and within the necessarily restricted field of ordinary relief operations; that the funds subscribed by charity are altogether insufficient for these purposes; and this House is therefore of opinion that a large and generous free grant should be provided to assist in meeting this unprecedented calamity,’ instead thereof.”—
(Mr. Souttar.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I do not think it would be respectful to the House that I, who am very little cognisant of the affairs of India, should attempt to detain it with arguments on the general subject on an evening when the debate must range over so vast a field; but the Amendment which has been moved induces me to detain the House for a short time while I express the views of the Government on this subject. It is a subject which commends itself to all our sympathies. All of us must have deeply felt the sufferings in India from this terrible famine; all of us have desired on the ground of that sentiment to which the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton referred to assist India if she needs assistance, even at considerable cost to ourselves. I hope, therefore, that in what I have to say to the House, I shall not be considered as in any way approaching this subject merely from the point of view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But I am bound to say something as Chancellor of the Exchequer, for I am afraid that what my noble friend the Secretary of State for India said in the earlier part of the evening is but too true—that nowadays every one sympathises with expenditure, and few people indeed care how that expenditure is to be provided. What are we asked to do by the Amendment of the hon. member? It would not have been, I believe, in accordance with our rules that it should have specified any sum as a grant to India in the painful circumstances in which the Amendment is submitted, but on the Paper we find that the hon. Member desires to grant a sum of £5,000,000 to India in aid of this famine. Now the speech of the hon. Member who made this proposal differed in one very material respect from the speech of the hon. Member who seconded. The hon. Member who made this proposal dwelt at some length on the sufferings of the population of India from taxation; and that view was also taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton, who, I think, suggested to the House that if it had not been for the famine large remissions of taxation would have been made in India; and therefore he argued—though I do not quite see that the argument was justified—that India was more highly taxed than this country. If there is to be a question of a grant to India from the Imperial Exchequer, I hope hon. Members will recollect when they talk so readily about the Imperial Exchequer that the Exchequer is the Exchequer of the United Kingdom and not of the Empire at large; and if it be a question of the power of India to bear taxation for this purpose, and the power of the United Kingdom at the present time to make this grant, there are some facts which I should like to place before the consideration of hon. Members. We have heard from my noble friend that the surplus of India in the year just closed is £2,800,000. I believe that in the previous year it was £2,600,000; but I have to remind the House that our deficit in the year just closed was nearly £14,000,000, that our estimated deficit in the present year is something like £23,000,000, and that within the last few days additional Estimates to the extent of £13,000,000 have been laid on the Table of the House. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that for our own objects we are not only not paying our way at the present time, but that we are largely increasing the debt of the country. What does the proposal of the hon. Member amount to, and how is this £5,000,000 to be provided? Is it to be provided by increased taxation in this country? Increased taxation for this object would be no more possible than it was for the whole of the great expenditure of the war. What we are asked to do, therefore, when we have in the present year and last year added to our debt £37,000,000, and when we may have to add more, is to increase our debt still further for the purpose of granting £5,000,000 to India, the whole net debt of which is no more than £30,000,000. But is it for the relief of our Indian fellow subjects? I speak subject to correction, but I believe that the main suffering from this famine is in the native States, for the finances of which and for the subjects of which we are in no degree responsible; and therefore it is proposed that either by way of increased debt or increased taxation—probably by way of increased debt—the taxpayers of this country should at such a time as this provide £5,000,000 mostly for the benefit of the inhabitants of the native States, over whose finances we have no power at all. That is a proposition which appears to me to demand the most careful consideration of anyone who has the least regard for the finances of this country. I notice that the hon. Baronet who seconded the Amendment did not put it on the ground of the taxation of India at all. He says, "I do not want to relieve the finances of India or the taxation of India." He agrees that the Indian Government has sufficient means and power to raise money to meet all the exigencies; the hon. Baronet put it purely on the ground of charity. His suggestion was that it was a grant we should never miss, and I think the hon. Member who made the proposal said it would be a generous gift out of our fulness and abounding wealth to the poverty-stricken population of India. I have shown the House the condition of the Exchequers of the two countries at the present time, and I confess astonishment that such a proposition should be based on such grounds as these, because it is not as if those who are responsible for the finances of India came to the Government of this country, or came to the House of Commons, and said, "We are in a position in which we are unable to provide sufficient means to meet what is required of us; we feel that we require the help of the United Kingdom in this great Indian difficulty; we appeal to you for that help which we think you ought to give us in remembrance of the past and what we have done for you." That would be a request which I should be the last man to disregard; it would be a request which I should feel bound to consider to the utmost of my power, whatever the condition of our finances here; but it is not the proposition we are considering to-night. We have been told by my noble friend, speaking after communication with the Government of India and with the authority of the Council of India, that this grant is not required; and, more, not only that it is not required, but that nothing could be done in the circumstances as they now exist which would be more prejudicial to the future of India than such a grant as is suggested. I think someone said that it would make no precedent, because this is the most serious famine that has ever been. But it would be a most dangerous precedent. Cannot the hon. Member see that if there be one duty more than another incumbent on the Government of India it is to provide beforehand for serious famines of this kind? Cannot he see that if we were to once give such a grant as is proposed without a request from the Secretary for India in Council, little provision for famine would be made in future? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton felt the force of that argument used by my noble friend, and I for one would never be responsible for detracting so completely from the responsibility of the India Office, for the thing which above all others they ought to care for, the preparations they should make by the machinery of their administrative government for famine by imposing upon ourselves a burden that they do not ask us to bear, and for which they have a special fund.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: You did it in the Afghan War.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Why? Because it was the opinion of the Parliament of that day that the Afghan War had been undertaken at the instance of the Home Government and against the necessities or requirements of India, and, therefore, in fairness the people of the United Kingdom should pay for it. But this is an entirely different thing from making a grant towards the Indian famine against the wish of the Secretary for India. Is it suggested for a moment that we are not doing anything at the present time to assist the Indian Government in matters of finance? The hon. Member who made this proposal stated that among the advantages which India had given to the United Kingdom was that she had lent 32,000 troops for South Africa and China. That no doubt is the case, but we are paying for them. We are relieving India of the whole cost of those troops while they are employed in South Africa and China. Why is it that the people of India maintain an army like every other State? It is required not merely for quiet times but for times of emergency; and this being a quiet time in India she is able, at our request, to spare some Indian troops for service both in South Africa and in China. We are paying the whole of the cost of those troops, though from my point of view it appears that India has some interest in Chinese affairs as well as the United Kingdom. By paying the whole of the cost of these troops we shall relieve India in this present financial year, I suppose, probably of not less than £3,000,000. I do hope that the House will have some regard in this matter not only to the claims of sentiment and sympathy, but also to the claims of reason and sound finance in India and in this country. The hon. Member deprecated India being called upon to meet this famine by borrowing. Why should we who are not responsible for this famine be called upon to meet it by borrowing? If the Indian Government comes to us and says that their resources are exhausted, that the future before them is so dark that they do not see their way to meet this terrible calamity without assistance from us, that assistance will be cordially given; but till that request is made I hope the House will support the Government in declining to assent to a proposal which, recommended as it may be by claims of sentiment and sympathy, is, in my opinion, contrary to the future advantage not merely of the United Kingdom, but of India itself.

*MR. MACLEAN: The House has now had the privilege of hearing from the Chancellor of the Exchequer the real reason which has induced Her Majesty's Government to refuse to give a grant to India. Such a grant has been approved of by the public feeling in this country, but it has never been listened to by Her Majesty's Government. Now we know from the responsible administrator of the finances of this Empire what is the real reason that has induced the Government to take up this position in regard to this matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that this is a time of great pressure upon the finances of the United Kingdom, and he also says that it is a time of great prosperity for the finances of India. But is there any real comparison between the two countries? Are not the resources of every taxpayer in England one hundredfold greater than those of the Indian peasant? Do we not know the extreme pressure of the taxation on the poor people of India? In this country taxation is scarcely felt by anybody, and it is a very light pressure upon the country. The taxes here are mainly paid by the wealthy, and they are hardly felt by the poorest in our midst. But every poor man in India pays his share of taxation, and feels the pressure of it very acutely indeed. I was surprised to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer say that no appeal had ever been made from India for help, and that if such an appeal were made it would have at once been listened to.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Not by the Government.

*MR. MACLEAN: Why has Lord Curzon had to scour the world in the hope of getting charity from all the nations of the earth instead of coming to Her Majesty's Government at home, from whom he might have got fifty times as much as all the foreign countries were subscribing in charity for the benefit of India? Is it not that he has had a hint from the Government that it is not desirable, and that it is not considered appropriate that they should be pressed to give a large grant to India at the present moment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that no need has arisen. I say it has arisen. It has been asserted in many of the speeches which have been made that everything has been done in India to avert famine that was possible, but that is not the case. Within the last forty years there have been ten recurring famines in India which have swept away at a moderate computation 15,000,000 human beings. These people have been absolutely wiped out of existence. The present famine is incomparably a greater famine than any of the nine famines which have preceded it. We cannot tell at the present moment what the extent of that famine has been, but I should say it would be no exaggeration to declare that between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 human beings have died through the ravages of this famine in India. Therefore, when it is said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton that the administration of famine relief in India during the past year has been marked by wonderful success, I deny that that has been the case. The first plain duty of the Government has been frankly acknowledged to be to prevent death, and I say with perfect fearlessness in this House that the Government have not prevented death, and that people have died every week by tens of thousands without getting any help from the Government at all. Look at the returns published from Bombay of the deaths which have occurred in that Presidency, and in the native States. There are 1,500,000 people on famine relief in the Bombay Presidency, and the deaths among those people alone amount to 13,000 per week—that is to say, between 650,000 and 700,000 deaths in one year. Therefore in two years, if this famine lasts, the whole of that population of 1,250,000 human beings will have been completely swept away by the ravages of famine. It has been stated in many quarters that it is not famine that has caused the death of all these people but cholera, or intermittent fever. But those are merely different names for the same thing, and they are merely aliases for what is the real cause of the death of the people which is simply starvation. The people come to these relief camps which are nothing but pest houses where they are exposed to the ravages of epidemics. They come to these relief camps from their homes in the last stage of exhaustion, for they have not the means of subsistence or the means of recovering strength to do the work which they are called upon to do. Consequently they fall victims to these epidemic diseases and they die off rapidly. That is the cause of the appalling mortality which has occurred in India. Upon whom does the responsibility for this mortality rest? It is a mortality which is admitted on all hands, and even the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India would not venture to deny it. Upon whom does the responsibility rest? It is divided between the Secretary of State and the Viceroy of India. I do not mean the Secretary of State personally. I have no doubt of his sympathy with the people of India, and I agree with a great deal he has said about the admirable way in which a great part of the work has been done. I am aware that large sums of money have been spent, but the staff out there has not been sufficient to give the people relief. Directly cholera appeared, those great camps that are formed should have been broken up and the people distributed in their own districts, and looked after more carefully by officers of the Government. The Governor of Bombay acknowledges that his staff was so small that the areas affected could not be covered. There is room for the employment of Imperial funds and Imperial officers to help those civil and military servants of the Crown in India who have been so splendidly doing their work as Englishmen under most difficult circumstances. But nothing of the sort has been done by the Government of India. On the contrary, they have sat still and done nothing. The noble Lord has waited in his office for the monsoon to appear. He has of course written the inevitable letter to the Lord Mayor, which seems to be a remedy for all the ills which flesh is heir to. Instead of presenting money to that country, he is now going to accept a large gift of money from the Maharaja of Gwalior, who is a rich Indian prince. The noble Lord came down here the other day with an admirable ingenuousness which we cannot too much applaud, and spoke of the great gift which the Maharaja of Gwalior has made in order to fit up a hospital for the benefit of our soldiers and sailors engaged in the Chinese War. I should say that when the Imperial Government received an offer of that sort—which seems to me to be only another illustration of that spurious Imperialism which is spreading like a parasite over the whole British Empire—at a time when India is suffering the terrible ravages of famine; when they received an offer of nearly £200,000 from an Indian prince, they would have had the politeness to refuse such an offer and tell that native prince that he could better employ his money by giving it to his own starving fellow countrymen at home. We have had enough of these offers of gifts of hospitals from all parts of the world. England ought to be ashamed to accept such gifts from any country so long as we are rich and strong enough to maintain our own soldiers and sailors in health or in sickness; and we do not want to have hospitals sent to us as free gifts, either by enterprising citizens in America or India who desire social recognition in English society, or from Indian princes who wish to compete with one another for the favour of the Imperial Government. So much with regard to the responsibility of the Home Government. But the responsibility of the Government of India lies much deeper. The noble Lord the Viceroy of India is a man of great personal energy and ability, and he has taken a step which I ventured two months ago to recommend him to take in this House. I stated here that it would be very much better if instead of issuing admirable regulations he came down from the heights of Simla and went about in the poor districts to see for himself what could be done to deal with this great difficulty.

MR. MACLEAN : Yes, that was a long time ago. But I am very glad to see that he is now trying to put all the new energy he can into the people who are charged with the duty of conducting the administration in India. There is this to be said with regard to the resolution proposed by my hon. friend opposite: that it will have to come eventually to a free gift to the people of India from the Imperial Treasury. There is no doubt that India is bleeding to death under our rule, and that the country is nearly exhausted. India has mainly an agricultural population, but the people have not the means by which they can produce crops and restore the land to a state of fertility unless a free gift is made to them. A free gift given in the way of charity will not suffice, for the money will be spent upon necessities and the land will be no better off. Such gifts ought to be supplemented with a comprehensive policy, and one distinguished by foresight. That policy was framed long ago by the Government of India on the recommendation of a gentleman who was one of the most distinguished public servants who ever existed in India. Forty years ago when there was a great famine in the North-

Mr. Maclean.

West Provinces Lord Canning, who was Viceroy of India, appointed the late Colonel Baird Smith, who was equally distinguished by his valour and his administrative capacity, to draw up a report upon the famine and advise the Government of India as to what could be done to prevent the recurrence of such a stupendous calamity. Colonel Baird Smith injured his own health in pursuing that work, but he furnished a most comprehensive and able State paper in which he recommended that the land assessment of India should be permanently settled for the whole of that country, and not merely in a few provinces of Bengal. That was a distinct recommendation that he made, and he converted to his view not only Lord Canning, but also Lord Lawrence and Sir Richard Temple. Not only did he convert people out in India, but that policy of settling the land revenue on a fair basis and fixing it for all time was taken up in this country by the late Sir Charles Wood and Sir Stafford Northcote, and it only failed because the Manchester school at that time foresaw that if the land revenue was reduced very heavy indirect taxation would be the result and large import duties would be levied on English piece goods. That is the real remedy for the state of things which exists in India, and it is the only manner in which the ryot will be enabled to accumulate stock and to devote all his energy to the cultivation of the soil. At the present time the Indian peasant is virtually taxed upon his own improvements. He is rack-rented on his own improvements. Directly he gets his head above water and succeeds in cultivating a certain portion of land, and getting more out of it, the agent of the State comes down on him and demands half the net profit of his field, and drives him back again to the stage of despair from which he had just emerged. Depend upon it, if we are ever to appreciate our real responsibility to the people of India we must undertake a reform of this land assessment, and we must fix it on a reasonable scale. When I mentioned this subject in the House a couple of months ago, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton rebuked me for saying that the land revenues of India brought in £18,000,000 a year, and were in spite of the famine expected to bring in that amount next year. The right hon.

Gentleman quoted Mr. Fawcett to show that these land revenues were merely a portion of the rent. Those of us who have had any connection with India, and who have studied the working of the land assessment and the terrible results which follow from it, know the position much better than Mr. Fawcett, and we are not going to be overawed by schoolmen from Oxford or Cambridge. Only to-day I came upon an extract from a book which was sent me which shows the view taken of this matter by no less a person than Sir Louis Mallet, who is one of the most fervent disciples of Cobden, John Stuart Mill, and the Manchester school. He had also some acquaintance with India, and he said that the results of this land assessment were underrated, and that he would rejoice to see it placed on a more satisfactory footing. That would be a policy worthy of an Empire like this to undertake. We are accustomed to speak of the benefits which railways and irrigation works have conferred in India. I do not undervalue these great improvements, but I say the natural fertility of the land in spite of them is decreasing in India. I will quote one or two figures showing that. In the middle of the seventeenth century, during the height of the prosperity of the Mogul Empire, the average produce of rice in India was 1,335 lb. per acre, of wheat 1,155 lb., and of cotton 67 lb. The statistics for the nineteenth century show that the average yield of rice per acre is from 800 lb. to 900 lb., of wheat 600 lb., and of cotton 52 lb., so that the actual produce of the land, in spite of all that has been done, has fallen something like 50 per cent. The question which suggests itself is, what remedial measures must be adopted to improve the fertility of the soil? I venture to point out one such measure based on the most careful study of India, and recommended by some of the most able statesmen who have ever ruled that country, and that is to revise the system of land assessment and to give fair play to the Indian agriculturist. I am quite sure that if Lord Curzon would examine this matter for himself he would build up for himself an enduring fame and would redeem this country from the reproach that while India has a most fertile soil and a most docile population she has a very incompetent Government.

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, Barnsley): Having travelled through the famine-stricken districts in India early this year, and having seen the terrible suffering of the population, I feel I must offer a few remarks in support of the proposal which has been made that India should be given a grant of £5,000,000 out of the Imperial Exchequer. I desire to bear testimony from my own personal observation to the most admirable and self-sacrificing manner in which officials, from the Viceroy down to the lowest official in India, are grappling with this terrible devastating famine which has spread over so wide an area and which is greater in relation to the number of people affected by it than possibly any famine which has ever occurred in the history of India. I think it would be a great act of sympathy if the House of Commons unanimously voted this money without a word of discussion, but I go beyond that, and I say that it would be an act of restitution to the people of India. We have a right to come to their assistance in this time of severe emergency. Lord Welby's Commission acknowledged that more than a quarter of a million annually was being overpaid to the Exchequer of this country from India, in connection with the financial arrangements between the two countries, and that it should be put an end to. But I should like to know whether this policy is not to be retrospective. We know that this sum of money at least has been exacted from the people of India for the last twenty years, which amounts to the £5,000,000 proposed in this resolution. If we grant it, we shall have had the benefit of the whole of the interest we have derived from that money, to which we have no just claim. Is it not also a fact that a third of the whole British Army is quartered in India, and that one-third of our Army Reserves are being created at the cost of India? I do not know how far that aspect of the question was taken into consideration by Lord Welby's Commission. We have been told to-night by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the inhabitants of the native States of India have practically no claim on the sympathy and the financial aid of this country. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is or is not true that the Queen of England is Empress of the whole of India, and that every inhabitant of India is a subject of the Empress? That being so, I venture to say that the inhabitants in the native States have an equal claim to our assistance and generosity as have the inhabitants of the States directly governed by us. We are told that India is to receive considerable financial relief by the fact of 20,000 troops from that country have gone to South Africa and to China to uphold the interests of the British Empire. We are told that that will mean a saving of at least £3,000,000 sterling. I find that the total net cost of the army in India is £15,000,000 sterling, and that 20,000 troops are just about a tenth of the whole native and European army, and therefore it appears to me that the utmost saving to the Exchequer of India that can be effected if these troops remain absent for a year will be one and a half millions, not three millions. With regard to the famine and to the measures which are necessary for the relief of its victims, my own view is that what is needed is a vigorous policy of opening up and developing India by the laying down of more railways, and especially the construction of irrigation works, so as to grapple with the question once for all and lessen immensely the probability of the recurrence of famine. I am sorry to notice that in connection with the heavy expenditure on famine relief it has been found necessary to reduce the amount spent on railway construction and irrigation works. When I was in Calcutta, in January last, I had an opportunity of discussing this whole question with the Viceroy. He is as keen on railway extension, and the construction of irrigation works as anyone can possibly be, and I know that he greatly regretted being obliged to stop the construction of railways in various parts of India on account of the special expenditure rendered necessary by the famine. But what I wish to submit to the House is whether there is any reason why the construction of railways should not proceed irrespective entirely of any special expenditure on famine. What are the facts? The railways of India last year, including military and famine lines, earned an average dividend of 5·32 per cent., and we know that by the construction of many feeder lines, which will pay well in themselves, the profitable character of the main lines is likely to be increased. That is the financial result of the whole railway system in India, and it can be improved still further. We know that reproductive public works have not given sufficient employment to the people of India; but we would not only be giving them present employment by opening up the country in this way, but works would be undertaken which would permanently give considerable employment to the people of India. In connection with the East India Railway, we find that they cannot get the Government of India to allow them to raise money which is so urgently required for the purpose of supplying the line with rolling stock. The other day a deputation of Calcutta merchants brought this matter specially under my notice. We find that the great East India Railway during the last twenty years has not only discharged nine millions of capital debt, but has also covered a capital expenditure of from six to seven millions, and has reduced its liability to the Government of India by twelve millions. At present the surplus profit from the East India Railway coming into the Exchequer is more than a million annually. What is the situation at present? One firm owning collieries had 30,000 tons of coal stocked at the collieries; they had ships waiting at Calcutta for it; and yet they could not get them loaded for six weeks because the railway company had not the necessary rolling stock to carry the coal to the port of shipment. It is also true that wheat and seeds have been detained at railway stations for weeks together for want of trucks. A gentleman whom I only met to-day, and who owns large works in Calcutta, told me he had to cease work because he could not get coal from the collieries.

*MR. SPEAKER: These observations are not relevant to the Amendment.

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON: I had no intention of going beyond my right, and I will defer any further statement in regard to this matter until this particular Amendment has been disposed of; but perhaps I would be in order in urging that the proper way to deal with famine in India is by opening up and developing the country by railway extensions and the construction of irrigation works. I think I am justified in advocating that, by reason of the fact that the railways pay exceedingly well, as do also the irrigation works. The irrigation works last year

earned on an average a profit of 7 per cent. The interest was only 4 per cent., and therefore there was a clear profit of 3 per cent. which went into the Indian Exchequer. Is the financial position of India, after all, so bad that the work of constructing railways and the carrying on of irrigation works should not proceed? The railways of India earn 5.32 per cent., and I presume that money to extend them could be borrowed at 3½ per cent. I find in the explanatory statement that has been issued that, in taking account of the assets and liabilities of India, the capital value and not the present value is taken. I submit to the House that the 140 millions which is invested in railways earning 5½ per cent. is worth more than that capital sum, and, in the second place, that the irrigation works on which 23 millions have been spent, and which pay on an average 7 per cent., are certainly a marketable asset worth twice the amount they have cost. On that calculation the total realisable market value of our assets in India to-day would be 269 millions, whereas the total debt of India is only 212 millions, showing a surplus of 57 millions. Then, again, consider the enormous revenues from land. We got last year 16 millions from that source, which at twenty-five years purchase would be worth 400 millions. The only reason I quote these figures is that I hold that the financial position of India to-day is so excellent—there is no debt in the sense that we have a National Debt, because it is more than covered by revenue-producing assets—that we should be able to proceed with railway construction and irrigation works, irrespective altogether of the value of the telegraphs and public buildings, and the enormous revenues from land. Why, then, does not the Government of India deal with this question of railway construction and irrigation works on its merits? Why do they not separate the railway and irrigation accounts from the general finances of India? They would then have a splendid security, and they would be in a position to raise all the money they required for railway extension and irrigation works. I hope the right hon. Gentleman's sympathies will be with this proposal, and that he will be able to announce in the House to-night that at any rate he will give it favourable consideration, and that before long a separation of accounts may take place so that the opening up of India will not be retarded by any special expenditure in connection with famine. The extension of railways and irrigation works is the one practical way to increase the prosperity of India, and to prevent to a large extent the recurrence of famine, and even if famine did appear we should then be in a much better position to grapple with it.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Dr. TANNER, Cork County, Mid). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

*SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAG-GREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): There is one feature with regard to the debate to-night on which I wish specially to express my thanks to Her Majesty's Government—namely, the unusually early date granted for the discussion of the Indian Budget. I welcome this arrangement, as it has been considered a grievance in India that almost the only definite opportunity this House has of discussing questions affecting that country is postponed to the last night of the session. The present change will be regarded with satisfaction in India, and I trust that it will be allowed to form a precedent in future years. I am pleased to find that all the Amendments on the Order Paper relating to the Budget have reference to the famine, which evinces the great concern which the House as a whole feels about the terrible calamity from which India is suffering, and this sympathy by the representatives of the nation will be regarded with a sense of gratitude by the people of that country. But as the particular motion now before the House does not embrace all the points covered by the several Amendments, I wish, Mr. Speaker, to ask your decision as to whether it would be in order to refer to those points, and especially to the one with regard to the development of technical and industrial instruction, which forms the subject-matter of the Amendment standing in my name as follows—

“That the spread of famine and scarcity over extensive areas and affecting millions of inhabitants in India, although recurring at irregular intervals, may be regarded as a certain calamity to which that country is periodically exposed; that the disastrous consequences of such visitation are rendered unconquerable by the fact that an unusually large proportion of its population is allowed to remain dependent for its livelihood upon agricultural labour exclusively, whereas nearly all other industrial pursuits, for which the natural resources of the country offer wide scope, are neglected; that one of the most effective methods by which the rigour of the famines could be modified, and the buying power of the people now succumbing to them increased, would be to enable large classes of the agricultural population to pursue other industries; and that, therefore, it is the opinion of this House that the Government of India should adopt measures for the elementary industrial and technical instruction of the poorer communities, so as to fit them for more profitable manual labour in other directions besides agriculture."

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will be in order in dealing with any method of relieving the famine, or any measure which he thinks would prevent its recurrence.

SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAG-GREE: Of the several methods suggested there are four which deserve special attention as being calculated to mitigate the rigours of future famines, if not altogether to prevent their recurrence, either by lessening the burden upon the taxpayer, or by increasing the production of wealth in the country. Modifications in the different systems of assessment, and the adoption of protective measures against undue and uncertain enhancements, are admitted to have a close bearing upon the ultimate prosperity of the cultivator, and I am glad to find that the Government of India has before it important material in connection with these questions, as well as with regard to the question of elasticity, which is engrossing its attention. It seems to me a sound principle that enhancement should be regulated on the ground of an increase in prices. From the discussion in the Viceroy's Council on the last Financial Statement it is satisfactory to note that the revised Estimates were less than those of the Budget by 83 lakhs of rupees in Bombay, by 35½ lakhs and 38 lakhs in the Central Provinces and the Punjab, respectively, and that for the coming year large reductions are already promised in the estimates which were originally based on a favourable anticipation. The surplus shown in the revised Budget, in spite of adverse circumstances, is due in a great measure to the steady increase in the earnings of railways and irrigation works, and this fully justifies the provision of a crore of rupees for the extension of irrigation works, to which as a remedy against famines Lord Curzon has wisely directed his attention. Under the head of "Reduction of Expenditure" might be included a readjustment of the cost of maintaining in India forces which are required to perform Imperial duties. We have had considerable and valuable testimony from competent statesmen that the Indian foreign policy was determined by Imperial rather than Indian considerations, and I hail the announcement made by Lord Onslow in another place a few nights ago that Her Majesty's Government are willing to accept the recommendations of the Commission, and to give at least £250,000, and probably more, towards the relief of the revenues of India, that Her Majesty's Government desire to treat India not only equitably, but liberally; and that if time were given them they hoped to give effect to other recommendations of the Royal Commission. I trust Her Majesty's Government will go a good deal further in their final action on those recommendations, and see their way to make further concessions in the direction in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton has made so eloquent an appeal to-night for an ampler measure of justice to India. I also gladly welcome the determination of the Government to accept the recommendation of the Commission as to referring to arbitration questions in dispute that may arise between the Imperial and the Indian Governments. The interests of India, safeguarded as they are, no doubt, by the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, are apt to be brushed aside if submitted to the final determination of the Cabinet alone. But if, upon any question in which the authority directly connected with India differs from the Imperial authority, the points upon which they differed were referred to arbitration, it would go far to convince the people of India that the final decision arrived at was a fair and just one. I would now refer, lastly, to the great cause which leads to the impoverishment of the resources of India, and exposes her population to the ravages of scarcity and famine, which is not inaptly called the drain of the wealth of India. Under this head political thinkers and speakers include a great many questions, such as the large civil and military expenditure of the country, the home charges, the interest paid on foreign capital, and so forth, and they have their different panacea for these evils. To my mind, this great drain, the existence of which cannot be denied, is due to the enormous volume of foreign manufactured articles which are imported into the country. India pays out somewhere about fifty millions of tens of rupees under this head every year, or, to do away with what Lord Curzon very aptly termed "the dreadful and bewildering symbol of Rx.," a sum exceeding £33,000,000. Against this huge figure the value of manufactured articles exported from India is absolutely insignificant, so that the conclusion is undeniable that the manufacturing capacity of the country is infinitesimal. On former occasions I have quoted figures and statistics to prove this, and I shall not trouble the House by going over the ground again. When I first drew attention to this subject I was misunderstood and misrepresented by a certain class of people who imagined that my object was to discredit high literary education in India. Even my hon. friend the Member for Dumfriesshire was misled in that way, but I should be very much mistaken indeed if he is still of that opinion. It is naturally gratifying to me that the arguments I then advanced have found wide acceptance, and the necessity for the propagation of such industrial and technical teaching as might fit the people of India to bestow skilled labour upon the natural materials which are found in such abundance in their country is recognised. The interest evinced in this matter by the noble Lord and the Viceroy must be gratefully acknowledged. I regard the development of instruction in this direction as the most important of all remedies suggested against the terrible affliction of the oft-recurring famines. I shall briefly illustrate this by alluding to the fact that 90 per cent. of the population of India subsists on agricultural pursuits, and that if we succeed in withdrawing say, even 10 per cent. from this occupation, we at once reduce by so much the burden on the soil, and increase the productive power of that 10 per cent. by teaching them to turn raw material into articles of domestic use, every one of which nearly they now import from foreign countries. Owing to the scarcity of fodder in the present famine, large numbers of cattle have perished. I am told that for want of skilled manipulation, the hides were exported to foreign countries at the ridiculously low price of a few annas apiece. These same skins will return to the country in the shape of manufactured goods. If the natives were taught to manufacture such goods, to how many hundreds of thousands of people would this very material furnish lucrative occupation, and how much money on this one head be retained in the country? This is what might be said with respect to horns, bones, seeds, and almost every variety of material which is to be found copiously in India. In short, the extension of industrial enterprise would stop the enormous drain on the resources of India, and furnish the means of subsistence to a large number of those who succumb so easily to the ravages of famine. Gratifying as is the fact that the need for such teaching as might make this enterprise possible is widely and even authoritatively recognised, it is necessary that some steps should be taken to supply that need, and means devised to provide the necessary instruction. I have often been confronted with the argument that the people of India are averse to such education, and asked how it is possible to get a people to adopt trades or industries to which they are not inclined and would not take kindly; but the answer is plain. The mission of the British Government in India is absolutely a paternal one, and it places an obligation upon them to guide the people of the country. It is no excuse for the Government to say "The people do not want it, and will not do it"; that is not the position that ought to be taken up. It is the duty of the Government to find out what is good for the people of India, and then place such means at their disposal as they might be induced to adopt. All the schools in the villages and towns throughout the country should be provided with workshops and scientific laboratories, on a scale proportionate to their size and capacity, and by that means the people of India would be brought to see the desirability and the necessity of adapting themselves to the pursuit of industries of a lucrative character. At present the education of India proceeds in the direction of making the people literary scholars, which is right enough in its due proportion, but a nation of literary scholars is not one that is likely to advance in the paths of prosperity.

* See page 610 of this volume.

The bulk of a prosperous nation must be composed of people skilled in industrial arts and crafts, and it is the duty of the British Government to remedy the gross ignorance of India in that respect. If the people could be induced to gradually enter upon the manufacture of even one-fifth of the articles which are now imported, and which have entered into their daily wants, and which they are now compelled to purchase, famine would to a large extent disappear. I submit that this is the most effectual way of subduing the effects of this curse that overwhelms India periodically. This is the root cure for the future. Meanwhile, for the present, we have not only the prevailing famine, but unfortunately a dismal prospect for the coming year. Reports from India about the rainfall are alarming, and there is promise of continuous scarcity. This has enhanced the disappointment with which I heard the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When the right hon. Gentleman rose to speak, I fully expected he would make some announcement which would carry comfort to the hearts of the people who are in such dire distress, and that, at all events, he would hold out some hope of help. But the argument which he mainly employed was that Great Britain could not spare money for an adequate grant, because her Exchequer was poorer than that of India. This statement will be read to-morrow everywhere with surprise and even consternation. The right hon. Gentleman further argued that the credit of India was unshaken, and that she can borrow more than she requires for her needs. No doubt the credit of India is as good to-day in the midst of her sufferings as it ever was, and she can draw upon her credit as largely as she chooses for the purpose of obtaining relief, more especially as it is generally known that England is at her back; but a nation in this respect is like a man, who might have any amount of credit, but who, if he drew upon it too largely, would become a helpless bankrupt, and ultimately perish.

MR. WYNDHAM: In such a case the Government would come to her assistance.

*SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAG-GREE: I am grateful for that assurance. I make no claim on the part of India on the ground of right, of her past wrongs, or anything of the kind. I only appeal to the benevolence of the British nation, and to the high Imperial instincts which have recently been shown by the nation in various ways, so that India may feel that her relationship with England is not merely one of pounds, shillings and pence, but that England will stand by India to-day as India has stood by England whenever called upon to do so. I remember during the time of the American War, when there was a great crisis in the Manchester cotton trade, how the merchant princes of Bombay sent stupendous aid to Lancashire.

MR. MACLEAN: They were making their fortunes out of it.

*SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAG-GREE: I am surprised at my hon. friend, after his speech to-night, using this argument against the appeal I am making. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I do not base my appeal as any sort of claim whatsoever. I would not hark back on the past, or I might be tempted to dwell on the various instances in which the Indian Exchequer was unjustifiably burdened with large payments on account of the Persian and Abyssinian expeditions, the entertainment of the Sultan, the demonstration at Malta, and the Egyptian campaigns. I only plead for a generous grant in this time of India's need, on the ground that it would be essentially the sort of charity that covereth a multitude of sins. I make my appeal because I feel that amid our present distractions, and owing to the numerous calls that have been made on its purpose, this nation has not fully acted up to its noble traditions for sympathy with suffering fellow-subjects. A few days ago I made an appeal to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the concluding words of which I would take the liberty of reading to the House—

"As head of a Church the beneficence of whose operations and whose resources for doing good are practically boundless, I venture to appeal to your Grace in this time of India's direful need to make a call upon this nation for succour and relief. A day of general prayer and intercession, to be followed by a collection, in all the churches, would provide such a remedy. Divine grace thus supplicated would not be withheld, while the donations of the religious-minded specially called for from innumerable pulpits would result in a copious flow of that material help which would sensibly mitigate the evils of this gigantic plianity. Should it please your Grace to take my appeal into your favourable consideration, I need scarcely say that you will earn the unutterable blessings of countless masses of our suffering fellow-subjects in India, endear the Church to their hearts in its charitable aspects, and demonstrate as has never been done before to three hundred millions of the inhabitants of that country the benevolence, the potency, and the saving grace of Christian prayer and Christian charity."

The Archbishop's reply to that appeal was to the effect that it would be best for intending subscribers to send all contributions to the Mansion House Fund. Such a reply from the highest dignitary of the Church showed unmistakably that the heart and conscience of the nation had not been awakened. On this ground I urge that it is the clear duty of the Government to make a grant, and I trust that the decision announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be reconsidered. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would make an appeal to hon. Members opposite. If they really mean to serve India in this time of her distress, I would ask them not to press the motion for a grant to a division. We know that the division will be on the usual party lines, and the motion will be rejected by a large majority. It will be regarded as a decision which confirms and stereotypes the unfortunate declaration that has been made; but if the appeal for a grant is allowed to rest on the expression of views that has taken place to-night and which will be echoed in the press to-morrow, there may be some hope of a favourable consideration of this question before long.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I am not going to follow the hon. Gentleman in any of the arguments he has placed before the House. I will merely say that I do not think that he drew the right inference as to the amount of interest that there is in the motion under discussion. I believe that the country and the House are deeply moved at the distress in India through this famine, and I desire to add my personal appreciation of the closing remarks of the noble Lord, the pathos of whose words, to my mind, was expressive of the sincerity of the deep feeling of this country. I much regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made the speech he did. Though I quite see that there may be reasons why the Government could not accept this resolution, I object to the grounds which he gave for coming to that conclusion. I agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite that the comparison which the right hon. Gentleman drew with regard to the Exchequers was entirely fallacious, and one which will not bear the grip of argument for a moment. With regard to the famine now raging in India, I feel that no words are too strong to express our admiration for the way in which all officials responsible for the famine administration at the present time are doing their duty. From the highest officer down to the humblest official, whether English or Indian, they are doing their duty. They are doing duties which, if done on the field of battle, would have been made known to the world, and would have won the admiration of the public generally. They are doing their work silently, loyally, and unwitnessed, and I am sure that this House and the country cordially endorse all that has been said in praise of what they have done. The fact is, as has already been pointed out by the noble Lord, this is the greatest famine of the century, and the most widespread in its effects. We must remember that cholera in its most fatal form has been added to the horrors of the famine, and that has made the situation still more serious. In many districts in India the people had scarcely recovered from the effects of the famine of three years ago when they received this second blow. I do not desire to dwell to-night in any way on certain mistakes which have been made in the famine administration. I will only call attention to two things which I think have been unfortunate. First of all, there was the massing of the sufferers in relief camps distant from villages. I would also note the fact that the people receiving relief are paid a minimum of wages cut down to the starvation point. These things have had the effect, I think, of intensifying the evils resulting from the famine. No doubt when this famine is over there will be an inquiry into the whole circumstances. I am not going in any way to anticipate what will be the result of that inquiry. I would rather refer for a few moments to one or two of the remedies which I think are essential before India can be placed in a position satisfactorily to resist the awful consequences of these famines. It is a commonplace to say that the immediate cause of all these famines is the lack of rainfall. No possible remedy can affect that immediate cause, but I think all hon. Members will agree with me when I say that it is possible to make such changes in regard to the position of the great masses of the population in India who are peculiarly liable to the effects of famine as will make them stronger to resist its effects. I will mention one or two of these remedies which I think would permanently improve the position of the cultivators of the soil in India. My hon. friend below me has already referred to the need of extending irrigation works. I am not going into this question at any length, but I would like heartily to associate myself with what he said. There is need for extending irrigation works for famine-protective purposes in India. I notice that Lord Curzon in his speech at his Council in March last complained a little of the insistence of a certain number of those interested in India in this country upon this point. He said that apparently we were not aware that already a great deal had been done in the way of providing irrigation works for the purpose of preventing famine. That is perfectly true. What we say is, we think a great deal more ought to be done than has been done already. We have spent in India up to 1897 the enormous sum of £250,000,000, or thereabouts, upon the construction of railways. We have only spent £32,000,000 upon the construction of irrigation works. I think that that is a great disproportion, which ought not to exist, between these two kinds of public works, which have mainly for their purpose the prevention and the amelioration of famine. Of course the objection is made that you cannot make canals in high and hilly countries. This is a difficulty which no doubt prevails over a large portion of the Central Provinces of India. I reply to that—if canals are impossible, lakes are not. I would remind the House that there is a large number of storage tanks in certain districts of India, especially in the Central Provinces. They have been used throughout history in India. They have been a practical method for alleviating the horrors of famine, and I will ask whether it is not possible to construct storage tanks, at least in such districts as I have named in the Central Provinces, if it cannot be done elsewhere. If we cannot erect these storage tanks, what about wells? There are in Northern India a great number of these wells, and they could be, I venture to assert, multiplied to almost any extent. In concluding what I have to say on irrigation works, I would like to remind the House, and especially the noble Lord opposite, if he will allow me, that there was a specific recommendation in the Famine Commission Report of 1898, on this subject. It stated this—

“As the State in India is generally in the position of superior landlord, there are special reasons why the Government should undertake, without expectation of direct return, works peculiarly protective of agriculture, such as irrigation works.”

I venture to say that this is a sound piece of advice. Although the Government have not had a very long time to carry out that recommendation, I hope the noble Lord will to-night be able to say that they agree with the policy which underlies the statement. I hope also the noble Lord will be able to give the House some information in regard to the attitude of the Government to the Madras Irrigation Bill, which embodies a point of policy with the most direct connection with the question of famine. As some hon. Members may be aware, the Government of Madras passed a Bill making the irrigation rate compulsory. This is a most retrograde policy. It is contrary to the distinct recommendation of the Commission I have already alluded to. It is contrary to the universal usage in India, and there is no reason why this change should be made. That is a change which means that, in regard to Madras, there shall be a compulsory rate for the use of water from irrigation works, because, as my hon. friend below me has already pointed out, the interest earned by the irrigation works upon the whole is about 7 per cent.—at all events, it is over 6 per cent. I should point out also that the policy that underlies this Madras Bill is contrary to the position taken up by more than one previous Secretary of State with regard to similar legislation. Thirty years ago a similar measure was proposed, and the Duke of Argyll who was Secretary of State for India at the time, for three specific reasons refused his sanction. I am not going to trouble the House with the reasons in detail, but they were in the first place that a canal might not be able to supply for irrigation purposes the expected quantity of water; secondly, that the expected quantity being available, cultivators might decline to avail themselves to the expected extent; and thirdly, that excessive costliness of construction might, in order to render a canal remunerative, necessitate the imposition of higher rates than cultivators could afford or would voluntarily pay. If these three reasons against making the rate compulsory in regard to these works were valid in 1870, they are valid to-day. I hope the noble Lord will be able to give us some ground for hoping that he will not sanction this particular Bill. As the hon. Member for Cardiff has already pointed out, the root of the famine is the land question. India is an agricultural country. I agree with the hon. Member opposite entirely that it is of the utmost importance we should develop, as far as we can, the industrial resources of India, and I think he will also agree with me when I say that it will take many decades before India can hope to compete with the capital, the skill, and the science of Europe. Even when this does take place, the great masses of India will depend primarily upon agriculture. Therefore, in dealing with the land question in India with regard to famine, you are dealing with an issue of vital and permanent importance. I would like to make one or two remarks as to the principle regulating land assessment in India, and to point out that these facts have a direct bearing upon the consequences of the famine. Take, first, the principle now obtaining in Northern India. I will content myself with simply showing what the system there is. After a number of reductions had been made on the scale of assessment about fifty years ago, it was finally fixed at 50 per cent. of the rental. The system is to allow the landlord and the tenant to make their own arrangements, and then the State comes in and takes 50 per cent. of the rental. It is interesting to note that the then Governor of the North-west Provinces, Sir Antony MacDonnell, a man of the largest experience, and a most distinguished public servant in India, points out that this means, generally speaking, 8 to 10 per cent. of the gross produce of the soil. The arrangement has worked well hitherto, and I wish to suggest that it would be most desirable that a similar limit should be placed in regard to land assessment in the Southern Provinces of India. Just one word as to Madras and Bombay. Here the matter stands in a very different condition. As hon. Members know, the Government deal direct with the cultivators. The rent in many cases is excessive, and the cultivators are in a state of chronic poverty. I will only mention one fact to prove that statement. I find on reading the Report of the Famine Commission of 1878 the statement—

“The Government takes in rent not from 8 to 10 per cent. of the gross produce, as in Northern India, but from 12 to 31 per cent.”

I am afraid if the present day facts were examined the matter would be still worse in regard to that point. As to Bombay, the only evidence I will trouble the House with is what is divulged in the Crop Experiments Report in reference to the relation between the assessments. I find that, judging from the results of these experiments, it has been discovered with regard to the Presidency of Bombay that the assessment is very high, and that in some cases it reaches a scale of 42, 67, and even 96 per cent. of the gross product of the soil. Without wearying the House with any further facts and figures, I will content myself with simply pointing out that it seems to me plain that there is an inevitable connection between the scale of assessment and the present famine in these districts. With regard to the Central Provinces, I will remind the House that six years ago an enhancement took place of similar dimensions. Rents advanced from 20 per cent. to 105 per cent., and the effect of this enhancement has been inevitable. People are afraid to embark capital in the land, and when famine comes, as it has come to that district to-day, the people are practically helpless to resist it. The moral of these facts is written, I believe, very plainly in the history of the famines in India. I do not wish to say that it is only in those districts where land assessment is very high that famines ever come. What I do say is that an examination of the facts of the case proves beyond doubt that it is just in those districts that famines are always most severe. For instance, in 1877, as the House knows, it was in Madras that 5,000,000 died of famine, and in 1897 and 1900 it was in the Central Provinces where the famine seemed to have the worst results. To-day it is in Bombay. It is in these three districts and Presidencies that land assessments are higher than they are in any other portion of India. The House will ask, "In the face of these facts, what do you suggest?" I do not recommend a universal system. That would be obviously impossible. I do not recommend the extension throughout India of the permanent settlement. I do not recommend the creation of landlords in Bombay and Madras, as in other parts of India. What I do suggest is that an equitable limit should be fixed to the land revenue demanded by the Government, and that reasonable security should be given to tenants that this rate will continue. What do hon. Members think would be an equitable limit to impose with regard to land assessment? I would suggest this practical solution of the difficulty. I should suggest as to the limit that it should not exceed in any single area 20 per cent. of the gross product of the soil. Where you take an entire district into account, the limit should be 10 per cent. It is quite obvious that, if for famine purposes it is necessary to bring about some changes in the way of moderating the land charges throughout India, you must have money to do it. It is perfectly foolish to suggest that these reforms should be carried out and the remedies applied unless you are at the same time to make some suggestion as to the source from which the money required is to come. The remedy proposed in the resolution is for a temporary and exceptional state of things. It does not go to the root of the matter, and will not be a permanent remedy. I would suggest that there is one source from which a large portion of the expenditure of India might be justly and reasonably curtailed, and that is the military charges now imposed on the Indian Exchequer should be reduced. I do not think I should be in order in going into the reasons that obtain—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is discussing a question that does not come within the scope of this Amendment.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: I said I would be out of order in going into details on that point. The hon. Member below me who moved the resolution spoke of the claim India had for some reduction in regard to this matter.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That hon. Member in speaking on that matter was speaking on the main question, but it cannot be discussed on the motion now before the House.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: If I cannot refer to it, it will be impossible for me to give even briefly my suggestion as to where the money required for bringing about this should come from. There was one remark the Chancellor of the Exchequer made in his speech which was not in any way sound. In reference to the fact that we are now making use of Indian troops in China and South Africa, he said that we pay in full for these services, and that therefore the Government of this country ought not to be asked for any assistance to India on that account. It seems to me that that is not an adequate reply to the question. The fact that we pay for the services of these troops while abroad does not in any way compensate for the fact that they are held in India, and that such a large sum of money is expended on them permanently for Indian purposes. I feel that in this direction we shall find some day a solution of the financial aspect of the question. I am glad that we have had an opportunity of discussing this question. I am grateful to the First Lord of the Treasury for giving us an opportunity earlier than the last day of the session for doing it. I regret deeply that the Government have found it impossible to acquiesce in the Amendment, but I do not altogether despair that the day is not far distant when they will reconsider their conclusion. If they do so I feel that the granting to India of a generous gift upon this trying occasion in the history of the Indian Empire will have results of the most wide-reaching and salutary effect.

*SIR EDGAR VINCENT (Exeter): It appears to me that the decision come to upon the motion before the House must depend in a large measure upon the opinion which is formed as to the financial position of India. It is quite clear that the decision with regard to the grant of £5,000,000 we are called upon to make depends to a large extent on the opinion we hold with respect to two questions—namely, is India in a position to pay? And, secondly, is it to the permanent advantage of India that England should pay this free grant? With regard to the first question I do not perceive in the arguments brought forward in favour of the motion any real attempt to prove that the finances of India are in such a condition that they are incapable of standing the strain of the present famine. If we look at the tables presented to us, what do we find? We find that there have been surpluses in the last two years averaging about £2,500,000 sterling. If we look at the commerce of the country, we see no sign whatever of diminution or exhaustion. On the other side of the tables I do see that during the last two years a reform—a great and permanent improvement of financial value—has been carried out. I think insufficient attention has been paid to the reform which has been executed with respect to the currency. It is within the knowledge of the House that during the last twenty years the one great danger of India, the great bane, not only of Indian finance, but of Indian commerce and administration, has been that proceeding from the fluctuations of exchange. I believe that the noble Lord the Secretary of State and the Indian Government are entitled to claim that in the course of the year under review they have practically solved that question. It is undoubtedly true that the immediate results of the reform of 1893 were disappointing, but the Committee presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton deserve the greatest credit for having perceived, in the midst of apparent failure, those elements which made for final and complete success. The redundancy of silver currency existing in 1893 could only be worked off by degrees. That absorption of the rupee has now taken place, and I believe we have attained a position of assured equilibrium. Surely that is a circumstance which should not be lost sight of in considering any question of a grant to India, or any question affecting the strength or weakness of the Indian financial position. On the second point, namely, whether it is to the permanent advantage of India that England should pay this free grant of £5,000,000, I admit that there are strong substantial reasons, which I do not at all underrate, for being generous, and if I argue the question, I will not do so from the point of view of the English exchequer or the burdens now incumbent upon English taxpayers. I would prefer to view the question from the point of view of Indian financial administration. It has been my fortune to be intimately concerned with the finance of several countries somewhat similarly situated to India, and I am sure of this, that had similar circumstances presented themselves I should have been opposed to a grant of this kind, and for various reasons, which I will state with all deference to the House. In the first place the right hon. Gentleman who spoke recently said that every country has its dignity in these matters, and that it is undesirable, unless it is absolutely necessary, to go to the English Exchequer in forma pauperis. Were India to fall back upon assistance from England there would be distinct deterioration. Leaving aside the question of dignity let us examine the question of practical administration. I have no doubt whatever that the task of the Financial Minister at Calcutta would be rendered considerably more difficult were this assistance to be given, because it is impossible for assistance of that kind to be given without its being considered, rightly or wrongly, as a precedent. We may say that here the circumstances are exceptional, and will never occur again. I wish I could take so optimistic a view. I am certain that if a grant is given to-night, or in the course of the present year, circumstances generally similar to those now present will recur, and recur very shortly, while the power of resistance will diminish. I believe that the forces which work under all Governments for extravagance, and work with particular strength under a military Government, which I take that of India to be, to a large extent would gain force. The military Members, who have always a great many reforms they desire, would say, "Well, if Indian resources are insufficient you know perfectly well you have only to turn to Downing Street, and from the Treasury you will receive the assistance you require." I am convinced that the Members who have most experience in the financial administration of States will agree with me that it is essentially important that a country should remain financially independent, and that it should sail, if I may be permitted to use the expression, upon its own bottom. It does not appear to me that sufficient proof has been afforded that real difficulty has arisen in India. I rather incline to the view that the present difficulty and the present stress is due in some measure to the fact that the Indian Government, somewhat like the ryot, does not in the days of prosperity make sufficient provision for those years of famine which inevitably come. Although I differ from the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in favour of a Vote from England, I agree with them to some extent in this, that I do not consider the present system of administration of famine relief and insurance to be altogether satisfactory. It appears to me that the Indian Government have put their case forward somewhat unwisely. Their administration of famine relief may be sound, but in giving an account of their stewardship they have created distrust and suspicion. Mr. Dawkins says that a new departure will be taken in regard to this fund. As the programme of railway works destined to relieve famine has been nearly exhausted, and the programme of irrigation works has been largely reduced, there will be a considerable balance of money unexpended on famine relief. The Secretary of State proposes to devote that sum to public works which without it would have to be met by incurring new debt. In other words, the Public Works Department will borrow from the famine relief fund instead of from the market. Is this a solution of the question? I admit that it is an advance on the present practice. That money will figure as an asset in the books of the Famine Relief Department, and as a liability in the books of the Public Works Department; but I should criticise the proposal from this point of view, that a departmental entry is not a commercial realisable asset in the ordinary sense of the word. I am convinced that the only satisfactory plan of meeting these recurring famines in India is to constitute such a reserve, either from surpluses or from an annual Vote, as shall place the Government of India in a position of assured independence, and as shall enable them to deal with famine in a more free and decided manner than would be now either justifiable or possible. Under the plan which I venture to advocate this annual sum or sums would be placed to the credit of an extraordinary fund, which would be invested in high-class non-Indian securities, and would be available to meet unforeseen emergencies without recurrence to English support. The Indian financial situation appears to me not to want relief by a grant-in-aid from London, but to require broader treatment. The management of a great exchequer does not consist merely in bringing in money, in reducing balances, and in saving interest. You cannot conduct the finances of a great empire on the same principle as the finances of a money-dealer or a bill-broker. The effect which your measures will have upon the mind of the financial world, and the impression you create upon the imagination of the taxpayers in India, are circumstances which must be taken into account. I hold it to be of supreme importance that in a country like India the population should realise that the Government is strong and wealthy, and disposes of ample resources to meet any emergency. During the recent famine I have seen it stated in an Indian newspaper that it was most undesirable for the Government to appeal to private benevolence lest it should be thought that they were in financial straits, and that they were obliged to appeal to individuals in India and in this country in order to give that relief to suffering which their straitened circumstances rendered them unable to furnish themselves. I contend that the mere fact that such a statement is made shows not that there is anything wrong with the financial administration of the country, but that there is something wrong with the method by which the results are brought before the public. I have a clear opinion regarding the financial soundness and prosperity of India, and I differ by the whole breadth of the heavens from those who think that India is either overtaxed or misgoverned. I differ no less strongly from those who think it is good policy to make India appear poor so as to diminish the financial burdens which may be cast upon her. My conviction is that the only right course is for the Government to make the finances strong and to let them appear strong. I would constitute such a reserve as would put this question beyond doubt, and I would invest that reserve not as is now proposed, in a departmental entry, but in such a manner as to show that it is a financial asset which is realisable, which the Government can fall back upon in times of distress, and which would enable the Government to deal with famine or war in a thoroughly efficient and satisfactory manner. It is within the memory of all that in Egypt, at a time when that country had gone through greater financial straits than

Sir Edgar Vincent.

India has ever been placed in, the moment years of prosperity commenced it was decided to apply all surpluses to the constitution of a reserve fund. Those who are acquainted with the administration of Egypt will agree with me that the existence of that reserve fund, which now amounts to about four millions sterling, has been the corner stone of all subsequent financial operations, and that it has imparted to Egyptian finance a strength and vigour and elasticity which appear to me to be somewhat lacking in a country of much greater strength—namely, India. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India has had the rare privilege of having relieved India of one grave financial danger—that of the fluctuation of exchange. I hope that the noble Lord will crown this considerable achievement by establishing in India a reserve which will place the Government in a position of assured financial security. I believe that this is the way in which future famines can be dealt with, and the remedy which I venture to propose is one of a permanent character, and not one merely a temporary relief like a grant-in-aid. The present scale of taxation in India in a normal year should leave at least a surplus of £3,000,000 sterling to constitute a reserve fund, and to this may be added the profit which will be realised upon the coinage of silver. I do hope that we shall in future abandon the practice adopted in past years of dissipating the surplus in small Departmental doles. Let the noble Lord in future adopt the bold and courageous policy of constituting a material and an effective, a public and manifest, reserve. If he adopts this course, I am convinced that the financial clouds which now obscure—and which have for so long obscured—the finances of our great Indian dependency will roll apart, and the peace, the prosperity, and the happiness of the inhabitants of that great Empire will be notably enhanced and confirmed.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I have followed with the closest attention the able speech which has been delivered by the hon. Member who has just sat down. The only remark I wish to make in regard to that speech is that, so far as my memory serves me, the mode of creating a famine fund which he has just sketched out was, in substance, the plan upon which the famine fund was originally established, and which successive Governments of India have, for good reasons or for bad, diverted from its original application. But, whatever be the merits of the plan, it seems rather to be concerned with the future than with the immediate present, and it is not, I venture to say, very intimately associated with the question which is now before the House—namely, the condition in which the Indian people are found at the present time. I listened very closely and with much interest a little while ago to the speech of the hon. Member for North-East Bethnal Green, and I may say that I cordially agree with him in the disappointment which he expressed at the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I only regret that at the conclusion of his speech the hon. Gentleman announced that he would not have the courage to support his views by his vote in this House.

*SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGREE: I must object to that phrase, because I made my meaning perfectly clear, and explained that in the best interests of India I wished the motion should not be divided on, as it was sure to be defeated.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I am perfectly aware of what the hon. Member said, but I think the excuse he gave for supporting the Government was a very thin pretext.

*SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGREE: I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a point of order. I am accused of opposing this Amendment upon a thin pretext, when I have absolutely given adequate reasons for the course I intend to take. Is the hon. Member in order in using that language?

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. Member has said anything which is out of order.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I say again that it is the thinnest pretext I ever heard advanced. The hon. Member said that the relations between this country and India were the relations of a benevolent Imperialism. The only commentary I desire to make upon the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is that it seems to me that both the benevolence and the Imperialism were conspicuously absent. One is always willing to make allowances for the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But after all, a Chancellor of the Exchequer is a Minister of the Crown, and I rather think that when the people of this country read the arguments by which the right hon. Gentleman has opposed the proposal which has been made from these benches they will feel humiliated. What are the arguments which he used? The first was that the present was an unfavourable time for making such a demand upon the national credit. He mentioned the burden which the war in South Africa had laid upon him. All that is true, but it does not seem to me that this unhappy war in South Africa, in which the Government has involved the country, should be permitted to relieve this country from its obligation towards our Indian fellow-subjects. If we are to take the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as representing the views of the Government, then we know exactly where we stand. We know from his statement that this war in South Africa is not only to prevent the fulfilment of the promises which the Government made to the people of this country, and to stand in the way of much-needed social reforms in England, but it is also to prevent the fulfilment of our obligations to the people of India, and prevent us assuming our proper position in relation to the affairs of China. This South African War seems to me to have weakened, humiliated, and paralysed the action of the Government in almost every quarter of the globe. The second argument of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to me, if possible, even more extraordinary than the first. The right hon. Gentleman said that he understood the bulk of this money which we are voting would go not for the benefit of British India, which is under the immediate government of the Crown, but as to the bulk of it would go to benefit the Native States. I will show that that is not so; but supposing it were so, the right hon. Gentleman knows that we interfere with the internal affairs of these Native States. To a large extent we prevent them governing themselves according to old Oriental methods, and insist on them adopting Western methods. It shows a curious want of the Imperial instinct when the right hon. Gentleman repudiates all responsibility for these Native States. The Indian Famine Paper issued this morning gives us the means of calculating roughly, but not inaccurately, the proportions in which this fund will go to the benefit of British India and the Native States. The grants which the Government propose to make are to be divided in the proportions of twenty-six lakhs to the Native States and fifty-five lakhs to British India. This question can hardly be decided without considering how far the Government has discharged its duty towards the Indian people. I cordially recognise the self-sacrificing efforts of the Civil servants in coping with this famine. They have not spared themselves; they have given their health, and even their lives, to the cause, and not a few of them have used their own pecuniary resources in aid of the famine-stricken people. What I want to do is to attack the system, not the men who administer it. The right hon. Gentleman stated this afternoon that over 11,000 natives had been crowded in a relief camp, and that terrible mortality had broken out, that the people ran away and carried the infection to other districts. He said that that was an exceptional case, but I question whether it was really exceptional. If we are to believe the testimony of credible and authentic observers, it was not an exceptional case. There were many places like it in the Bombay Presidency. There were camps in which 30,000 people were crowded together, and that was directly contrary to the Code, which lays down that relief works camps should be limited to 5,000 persons. What was the effect of having these large crowded camps? They became the centres of disease. Mr. Nash tells us that the Government of India knew perfectly well that cholera would inevitably break out in these camps, yet they did not take medical precautions which they ought to have taken; nor did they provide an adequate service of medical men in order to cope with the danger. The second point which I wish to emphasise is the incalculable loss of cattle during this famine. Now, could that loss of cattle have been avoided? The cattle died because there was no fodder for them; but there was plenty of fodder in other parts of India, and the cattle died because the fodder was not brought to the spots where the cattle were. If the testimony of competent observers is true, the transport of fodder hopelessly broke down. Mr. Nash, the correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, says that there was plenty of fodder ready packed for transport. Big stacks of grass running into hundreds of thousands of tons were stacked along the railway lines in the Central Provinces, and the whole of it was allowed to rot, and the few cattle left were allowed to die. The transport was ineffective, and unnecessarily aggravated the loss of cattle. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his very interesting speech, referred to the relations between the rulers of India and the ruled. He said there was an amount of sympathy between the Government of India and the people to an extent which had not prevailed in former years. But I would respectfully ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his own conscience is altogether clear in this matter, and whether the relations between England and India and between the Government and the governed in India have been improved by the recent changes carried through in the Indian Council. I would ask him whether he thinks that these relations of sympathy were promoted by the harsh treatment given the brothers Nattu, who were imprisoned for two years without trial, and in relation to whom the charges on which they were arrested were changed from time to time, and they were at last released without any charge having been established against them. I ask him further whether these relations of sympathy are likely to be promoted by what has happened at Cawnpore? I hope that the spirit which the right hon. Gentleman has shown in his speech this evening will be practically illustrated in the future relations between the Government and the governed in India.

*COLONEL MILWARD (Warwickshire, Stratford-upon-Avon): I am sorry that this debate has been rather narrowed down, because there were a great many questions of general interest in the speech of the Secretary of State for India, with reference to currency, trade, military preparations, railways, and irrigation works, all of which would have been very interesting if we could have followed them up. I regret very much the non possumus position taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the Free Grant, and I think that the people of this country to-morrow morning will rub their eyes when they see that our Exchequer is so poor and the Indian Exchequer is so rich. It is perfectly true that India had a surplus for two years, but owing to the famine there will possibly be a deficit this year. On the other hand, I do not think that any nation, however rich, has ever undertaken with so light a heart as we have an expenditure this year of something like fifty millions on a distant war, and I cannot help thinking that under these circumstances we might have spared one million at all events for the relief of the famine in India. The resolution which I have placed on the Paper* differs from that of the hon. Gentleman opposite. My position is this. The Chancellor of the Exchequer states that the Government of India have made no demand on the Imperial Government. That is true, but if they had made a demand on us it would have robbed us of the grace of making a free gift, and we should not then be in a position to voluntarily give this money. But although the Government of India have not made any demand of that kind on us, Lord Curzon has reiterated over and over again that there are things which public money cannot do, and that the famine victims cannot be helped in the same way out of public funds as by private charity. You cannot administer the assistance that is required in every degree and in every case out of public money. These are the things which a free gift may accomplish, and what I want to plead for is not to assist the finances of India, not to give a million or any other sum to help the Indian Exchequer, but that we should place a million at the free disposal of the Viceroy for the purpose of supplementing the inadequate subscriptions of the people of England. I do not blame the people of England for having inadequately subscribed. The charitable and philanthropic people of this country have been drawn upon from every direction in connection with the war, and it is not only a million that was subscribed to the Mansion House War fund, but I am perfectly sure that at least five millions must have been subscribed to the various funds. Can we wonder, therefore, that the amount subscribed for the famine in India has been singularly small? In 1897 the famine subscriptions were £700,000, and in March, 1898, the date of the dissolution of the 1897 Commission, the receipts amounted to £1,190,000, besides which there were large gifts of grain and clothing also received. What is the state of the Mansion House Fund now? It only amounts to £325,000.

*Colonel Milward had on the Paper the following notice:—"To move, That, having regard to the widespread distress in India, and to the comparatively poor result of the appeal for subscriptions for aid in Great Britain, it is desirable to supplement these subscriptions by a free gift from the National Exchequer of one million sterling, and that this sum be placed at the unfettered discretion of the Viceroy."

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Mansion House Fund is only about £350,000, but, in addition, £170,000 has been subscribed in Scotland and Lancashire.

COLONEL MILWARD: I did not intend to convey that the Mansion House Fund included all that had been subscribed, but, even taking that fund as it stands, it is quite £200,000 below what it was three years ago, in addition to which there were then great gifts of food and clothing, all of which are now sent to South Africa. What I venture to urge is that we might give a grant to India such as would supplement the small sum subscribed by the public in this country. The Report of the Indian Famine Commission of 1898 states—

"The testimony is unanimous and overwhelming as to the incalculable good the charitable fund has done as an auxiliary of the State system of relief and the universal gratitude it has evoked among the people. Seventy-one per cent. of the fund has been spent in giving a fresh start in life to peasant cultivators and small landowners who have been forced to eat their seed grain and part with their plough cattle, or whose plough cattle had died from want of food, or who had no agricultural resources left or no credit wherewith to procure them."

That is exactly what is taking place in India at the present moment. It is said that there would be no precedent for such a grant, but this very Parliament supplies a precedent. A year and a half ago there was a hurricane in the West Indies. At that time the Colonial Secretary addressed a letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in which he stated that the inhabitants of Barbados were unable to house or feed themselves. What happened? This Parliament gave a free grant of £40,000, and a loan of £50,000 without interest. Surely that was a case precisely on all fours with the present case, and surely the famine-stricken districts of India appeal to us at least as strongly as the Barbados. Then there is another reason which appeals to me very strongly, and that is the loyalty which has been shown by the people of India. I think the House ought to be reminded that on the 28th of December, the Nizam of Hyderabad offered his purse, army, and sword in the defence of Her Majesty's Empire, and also that the Maharaja of Gwalior offered a troop of horse and transport. On the 29th of December the whole of the 3rd Bengal Sikhs offered voluntarily one day's pay for the War Fund, and it therefore does seem to me that when the Nizam of Hyderabad offered his purse and his sword and the Maharaja of Gwalior offered a troop of horse, we have now an opportunity of showing our appreciation of such loyalty. I wish to associate myself with what has fallen from my hon. friend with reference to a division on this Amendment. I am not going into the lobby against the Government, because I will not be a party to squeezing the Government in order to get them to grant this money. Unless it is done freely there will be no grace in the grant at all. I hope the arguments I have addressed to the House will be considered. I believe that public feeling throughout the country is favourable to this grant. I mentioned it myself at one public meeting recently, and it was most enthusiastically received. What is a million among the many other millions spent in other directions when by it we may create a feeling of loyalty in India, and a feeling also that in the hour of her distress this country came to her assistance?

MR. EMMOTT (Oldham): I venture to intervene in this debate not only because of the interest which I myself take in this question, but also because my constituents have such a deep interest in all that concerns the welfare of the inhabitants of our great Indian Empire. I speak, of course, to-night my own views, but I am certain I carry with me also the views of the great majority of my constituents. The interest which Lancashire has in India, whatever may be said about isolated matters in the past, is by no means a purely selfish one. In the present dire straits of the Indian people my own constituents have shown their active sympathy, and have extended generous help. Although, like other inhabitants of this country, they have subscribed liberally to the various war funds, they have also subscribed largely to the Indian Famine Fund, and if the inhabitants of the remainder of the United Kingdom subscribed in proportion to numbers, as much as my constituents have subscribed there would be a fund of one and a half millions instead of half a million at the present time. But I am afraid, even if there were a fund of a million and a half, it would be far too little to relieve the dire necessities of India at the present moment. May I thank the noble Lord for his speech, which was able, luminous, most interesting, and above all intensely sympathetic? Lord Curzon on one occasion made an offer to pay the fare of any rich man to the famine districts in order that he might see for himself the sufferings of the people, and agreed to take a chance of a subscription on his return. I cannot help feeling with my hon. friend that the people of this country hardly realise the extent of this calamity. This famine affects ninety millions of people, or between a third and a half of the whole population of India. At the present moment there is a population larger than that of this great city dependent from day to day on the relief which the Government can give. Large tracts of country have become desert; there has been an immense destruction of cattle—in some districts as much as 90 per cent.—and comparatively well-to-do people have lost their all, and have been driven from their homes. I am therefore afraid that there must be a greater slowness of recovery than after previous famines. Added to all the misery and disease which accompany famine, there has been a great outbreak of cholera. Just about the time that we were mad with joy over the relief of Mafeking—and I think we did perfectly right to rejoice about it—what was happening in India? An English doctor arrived at one of these cholera camps, and he found 400 people dead, other peoplescattered about dying on the ground, others struggling in the water, where they had gone to drink, and had been seized whilst drinking, and everyone who could had run away. Could a worse inferno than that be imagined? There were many other places where similar scenes occurred, and I think that we should all remember it to the credit of India that all the misery and destitution of famine and all the agony caused by disease were borne with that silent dignity and unconplaining patience, so characteristic of those docile races whom it is our pride and privilege to rule in India. Such grief and pain borne silently is not, however, less pathetic than a sorrow which cries aloud in the bazaars and proclaims itself at every street corner. I do not wish in the least, however, that we should be governed by emotion in this matter. The loss of life from this famine may be less than usual, but the exhaustion that will follow it will be very much greater. The number of cattle that have died is simply enormous, and the low condition of the people seems to be so great that many will be unable to do any work for a long time. Lord Curzon, seeing what would occur, appealed first of all urbi to the Lord Mayor, and then practically orbi to the world at large, and among those who responded was the Sultan of Turkey. I almost wish he had kept his money for another object, and that he had saved us the necessity of accepting it. The total response to Lord Curzon's appeal was, however, miserably inadequate, and my own impression is that money must be found somewhere, or very serious permanent injury to India will be the result. There are only two methods of obtaining money, one by a loan in India and the other by gift from England. Large loans have already been made in India on the security of impoverished landowners. Most, if not all, of this money has to be paid back, and I fear the tax collector will appear only too soon after the famine. I think, therefore, that loans in India cannot extend much farther than they have done, and I think it is a case of a gift from England. It is said that would be against precedent, and I do not in the least dectry precedent. In a matter of this kind it is easy to relieve our consciences by generosity, and do permanent harm unless we give wisely. But the famine is unprecedented. It is an act of God, not the product of man's carelessness, and any precedent could only affect a future famine of equal proportions. Again, it is the second famine in three years. I further think that the Indian race is not a race with the instincts of paupers. There are other reasons of great cogency which might be urged. In the first place, it is desirable, even from the point of view of our trade relations, that as soon as possible India should return to a normal condition, but I attach more importance almost to the effect this gift will have on the people of India. A new era is now opening up in the Far East, and it is surely worth our while to try and bind India to us by the chains of affection. But my main argument is a financial one. India is already doing so much to relieve famine that I do not think she can be expected to do any more. She has been paying Rx.1,000,000 or Rx.1,500,000 per annum for many years for famine insurance, but in addition to that there are the import duties which were put on in 1894. They are practically a famine tax. They were put on because of the fall in the rupee, and were kept on because of war and famine, and I imagine, having regard to the noble Lord's past action, they would have been taken off had not this famine occurred. These amount to Rx. 3,500,000. Therefore India is already paying Rx.5,000,000 for famine at the present time. I will not refer to the Report of Lord Welby's Commission, except to say that it recommends that we should treat India generously, and that a considerable sum is due for past overcharges. I congratulate the noble Lord on the success of his currency policy. I do not want to say one word against that policy, because whatever one's opinion may have been regarding it at first it is now an accomplished fact, and no one would desire to disturb it. But there is a reverse side to it. The rupee was raised from 1s. 1d. to 1s. 4d. between 1895 and now, and that has had the same effect as a contraction of currency. It helped the Government, but I do not think it helped the traders or the agriculturists. We are hearing again from India the same pitiable tale of these silver ornaments being sold at even less than their melting value. This is an extract from the Civil and Military Gazette of Lahore—

"The fact that the Government of India have bought seventy-two lakhs worth of silver more than their programme contemplated means nothing. The fact that the silver comes from Gwalior means much. It means that the people of Gwalior have unearthed their long-buried hoards of silver ornaments and sold them to the bunnias, who have sold them to the Gwalior authorities, who have melted them down and sold the bullion to the British Government. We may expect to hear of other native States in the famine area following in the steps of Gwalior."

I have here a private letter showing that these silver ornaments are being bought for 5 to 8 annas per tola instead of the 10 annas they are worth. Here we have poor and middle-class people being cheated again, and not even getting the full value of the silver for melting purposes. Even if they had got full value they would have obtained only about 60 per cent. of what could be obtained seven years ago. I have tried to give some reasons why we should help India at the present time. I do not know whether my hon. friends will go to a division, but all I can say is that if they do I will vote with them with the greatest pleasure. I am a new Member of this House, and whether my stay be long or short in it I feel sure I shall never give a vote which I believe to be not only in the interests of India, but also, when rightly understood, in the interests of this country, with greater certainty than I shall vote on this occasion.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): No one can have heard the concluding words of the hon. Member's speech without feeling that at all events they came from the heart. The hon. Member stated he was going to vote for the Amendment on grounds which appealed to him as an Englishman and a citizen of the empire of which India is a part. I believe the hon. Member is absolutely sincere; but, if he will forgive me for saying so, I think he is absolutely wrong; and if he considers this matter in a thoroughly impartial spirit he will come to the conclusion, I think, to which I at all events have been driven—that not only the interests of India, but the interests of England and of sound finance throughout the Empire are really involved in the House coming to a sober and rational decision on the issue presented to-night. But there is one smaller matter on which I must first touch almost parenthetically. My hon. friend the Member for Cardiff in the speech he delivered made an attack on one of the great princes of India—a gratuitous and wholly unmerited attack. The Maharaja of Gwalior has made a most generous offer of assistance in connection with the trouble which we have to face with all the rest of the world in China. I should have thought that that offer would provoke the gratitude and thanks of every man in the House and of every citizen in the Empire. But that is not the way the matter has presented itself to my hon. friend. He says—"Why did not the Government compel the Maharaja to devote the money which he has offered so generously and patriotically to the alleviation of the sufferings of his own countrymen?" My hon. friend spoke hastily and without adequate knowledge of the fact. This prince is still young; but he has had time to show himself one of the most energetic, public-spirited, and patriotic Princes reigning under our suzerainty in India. He has not confined his efforts, as my hon. friend thinks, to extraneous charity or outside the boundary of our Indian possessions. His own subjects, some of whom have been touched by the famine, have received from him the most generous assistance; and, not content with dealing with the subjects within the limits of his own province, he has gone to the assistance of other and poorer Princes in India. And, after all, for whom is this hospital intended? It is in the main intended for that Indian contingent which has gone from India to China to fight the battles of the Empire, and I cannot imagine a cause which would more naturally and more properly appeal to the generous instincts of an Indian prince than that cause to which this prince has so nobly and generously subscribed. I said I would treat this matter parenthetically, but I could not leave it untouched because it involved a personal and most unmerited attack upon a prince who is an example to all who have similar great responsibilities cast upon them within the limits of our Empire. Everyone must feel that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dumfries has been prompted by generous sentiments which have nothing in them of self-interest, but which are dictated purely by a feeling of sympathy with India in the appalling and almost unprecedented calamity now affecting that country. But in this House we have to ask ourselves not whether the sentiments which prompt a particular resolution are generous and praiseworthy or not, but whether its results are likely to be beneficial not merely to the relatively narrow interests of the United Kingdom, but to the larger interests of which the United Kingdom is the principal guardian. I venture to submit that the arguments my noble friend urged in his admirable speech, reinforced as they have been by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, have not been replied to. The Amendment is avowedly an attempt to substitute

Parliamentary charity, extracted pro rata from the pockets of the taxpayers, for the spontaneous gifts of those anxious to relieve distress in India or any other part of the world. No doubt there are occasions when a Vote of the House may rightly be invoked in favour of a cause for which charity has been invoked. But the inevitable result of the House accepting the Amendment can only be that never again will any appeal of this kind be responded to by the public. It will be felt that Parliament itself has declared solemnly that it is a matter for the taxpayer and not for charity. Charity will be dried up at its source, and in every case in which hitherto charity has been invoked you will have gentlemen coming to this House and saying, "You have set a precedent which should be followed. This is not a case in which private benevolence should be appealed to. The proper course is to propose a Vote in Committee of Supply, or ask for a loan from the investing public." That is a precedent which, if set at all, should only be set with the utmost caution and in cases of the extremest necessity. Is this a case of the extremest necessity? It would be if the refusal of the House to accept the Amendment were likely to produce any additional loss of life from this famine. But my noble friend has told us repeatedly that if India should be unable to meet the necessities of the case she has behind her the British Exchequer. It is not pretended that the finances of India are in such a condition that she is unable, so far as the preservation of life is concerned in the afflicted districts, to deal with such a crisis of unprecedented magnitude as that with which she has to contend. Under these circumstances any charitable donation made by the House at the expense of the British taxpayer—for that is the proposition—would be made to India without India requiring it, without India pretending she required it, and in advance of any necessity. If indeed the Government were to tell the House that our interests are so alien from the interests of India that we regard India as a possession from which we mainly derive indirect profit and direct glory, but to which we feel ourselves so little responsible that we are not willing to come to her assistance, then hon. Gentlemen would be justified in saying that the British Empire was indeed unworthy of our great Indian possession.

We put forward no such proposal. All we say is that sound principle requires that the financial responsibility of the different parts of the Empire should be kept separate, and it is only when the financial resources of any particular part of the Empire absolutely fail that it is legitimate to call upon the rest of the Empire for assistance. My hon. friend behind me, who spoke last but one, quoted the precedent of the West Indies. He said that in 1891, and again last year, or the year before, a sum was voted by this House to meet the calamity which had desolated the Leeward Islands. But the precedent quoted by my hon. friend is in favour of the Government, and not against it. For the precedent is this—that it was only when a dependency of the Crown was practically in financial extremities, when it had not at its command the resources which would enable it to meet the strokes of evil fortune by which it was overwhelmed, that this Parliament and people came to its assistance. If ever India is in the condition of the Leeward Islands, this country will come to the assistance of India as it came to the assistance of the West Indies. I would venture to suggest that even the action we took in the case of those islands, used as it has been by my hon. friend, shows how careful we should be in starting new precedents of this character. The late Secretary of State for India, who made so excellent a speech, I remember, two years ago divided the House in favour of a grant to India to meet a famine which was then raging in another portion of that Empire, although at that moment she had a large surplus at her disposal. Now, supposing the right hon. Gentleman had succeeded in his endeavour on that occasion to induce the House to subscribe a large sum for that famine, followed as that case would have been by the present famine, would it not be clear that an Indian famine meant a Vote of this House towards Indian needs as regularly as in the past an Irish famine has meant an appeal to this House for Irish needs? Is that a precedent which this House would readily set? Do they desire so to mix up the Indian and British Exchequers as to make it a matter of course that whenever a famine exists in India, even though Indian finance may be in the highest state of prosperity, that is a just cause for coming to this country for financial assistance? That would be, as has been pointed out by my noble friend, the most certain method of introducing disorder into Indian finance. I am one of those who believe, and, indeed, it will be accepted as a commonplace, that the most fruitful parent of social troubles is financial irregularity and extravagance, and that the country which is reckless of its resources is a country which is rapidly approaching the greatest social and political difficulties. [Opposition cheers.] That appears to be a commonplace accepted by both sides of the House. Can that danger be more certainly produced in India than by that kind of charity which has met with so much favour on both sides of the House to-night? Can you conceive of a temptation which it would be more impossible for any Indian financier to resist than the temptation of appealing to a House, for whose action he was not responsible, to taxpayers whose interests it was not his business to guard, for resources which would enable him to meet difficulties occurring many thousands of miles away! My noble friend certainly did not go beyond the truth when he said that to come forward to Indian assistance when India is not in financial straits would be to infuse into the veins of the Indian financial system a principle of corruption from which it would never recover. I hope the House will never consent to that proceeding. I am reluctant, and I do not mean, to put the matter on selfish grounds. I do not mean to base the main stress of my argument upon the position of the British taxpayer or the burden thrown upon him, but I must say I listened with some surprise to an observation that fell from an hon. friend behind me. The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon said that when we were spending forty or fifty millions upon the South African war, could not we spare one million for the Indian famine? [Opposition cheers.] Apparently the argument of my hon. friend meets with approval on the other side. Let us translate it into simpler language. So translated it comes to this—that the heavier the burdens and the greater the expenditure which Imperial necessities throw upon the British taxpayer, so much more ought the subscriptions of the British taxpayer to be for the financial needs of other parts of the Empire. Surely that is a financial paradox which can hardly be accepted by the sober reflection of the House. Let it be remembered that this Empire of ours is at present run on a system never tried in the world before. The Empire is one of unprecedented extent in mere area, and portions of it are to be found in every quarter of the globe. It is all paid for, as an Empire, by these islands.

MR. MACLEAN: India pays its own way.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. India pays her fair share.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON: I beg pardon; India pays more than its own share, according to Lord Welby's Report.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is probably not aware that as soon as Lord Welby's Report was made public the Government announced their intention of paying their quota. I may therefore assume that, according to Lord Welby's Report, the balance of payment between these islands and India is equitable. But the Empire as a whole is run by these islands, and if you are going, in addition to that responsibility, to say that whenever a calamity occurs in any part of that Empire the responsibility is also to fall upon the taxpayer of these islands, I say you are rushing into financial responsibilities of which you may have in a very few years great reason to repent. I am one of those who watch with considerable alarm the growth of expenditure we have to view already. But if to that expenditure, great and growing, and, I fear, likely to grow as it is, you are going to add these additional burdens, then, indeed, even the wealth, the enterprise, and the patriotism of this country may feel itself at last overburdened. I feel most strongly that the resolution which the House has got to take to-night is one of the deepest import for the future of the Empire. What we ask the House to affirm is that the financial responsibility for the various portions of the Empire rests primarily upon those portions of the Empire, and that in particular the financial responsibilities of India are Indian responsibilities and not British responsibilities. We admit, and I would take leave to ask the House to affirm, that in cases where Indian resources are not equal to Indian needs this House may well be asked to come to its assistance. But at the same time we also ask the House to affirm that, until these needs do become greater than Indian resources can bear, it is not only not true charity, it is not only not sound policy, but it is absolutely suicidal for us to endeavour—in a mood of sentiment with which everybody must sympathise, in response to motives which everybody must feel, to relieve sufferings that go to the heart of every feeling man—to prematurely and unnecessarily burden the already heavily-burdened finances of this country.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I ask the permission of the House to read an extract from a letter which I have received from India this evening. My correspondent writes from Poonah, under date 6th July, and his letter indicates that the extremest point of necessity has at last arisen. He says—

"It is with a heavy heart, with no little sense of responsibility, that I now sit to write to you; and I beg your thoughtful and very prayerful consideration of what I am about to say. The month of June—the first month of the monsoon, and in some respects the most important—has come and gone. The result, as far as the rainfall is concerned, tabulated from the official returns, is shown in the Deccan Herald, dated 3rd inst. Briefly stated it is this: In the famine affected areas the rainfall has been defective from 71 to 91 per cent.—that is, in regions of the severest distress where 100 inches would have barely brought alleviation, only nine inches had fallen! But this is not the most appalling feature, for assuming a late rainy season, the monsoons with their refreshing freight might be yet looked for; but the affected regions have 'been outside the influence of both monsoon currents.' In other words, both the N.E. and S.W. monsoons have come, and spread feebly, but without bringing the longed-for refreshing and fertilisation to the death-stricken regions. This means—no relief for the present, and hardly any hope for the future. The ominous forecast of this prolonged drought is summed up in the Vanguard of 30th June. 'This famine is, perhaps, the most fearful calamity that has ever visited this earth. The worst is to come. The most reasonable estimates are that from 18,000,000 to 20,000,000 will perish in this dearth now spreading over the whole peninsula. Nothing of the kind has appealed to the hearts of Christian people as the death-cry of these starving millions.'"

If this is not a case of extreme necessity I do not know what is.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not financial necessity.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: It is a financial necessity, because it is quite beyond the power of India to feed the twenty millions of people who are famine-stricken. India is an extremely poor country. The great majority of the Members of the House have no conception of the poverty of that country. The taxation of India is very heavy upon the very poor people, and it is entirely beyond the power of India to cope with this famine. Personally I shall heartily vote with my hon. friend.

*MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): It is not my intention to stand long between the House and the division; but I think there need be no apology for any Member of this House at ten minutes to twelve o'clock to rise and express his opinion about the questions which have been discussed all night. I merely wish to say that while we appreciate to the full the kindly spirit which the noble Lord the Secretary for India and the First Lord of the Treasury have displayed—and I am quite sure they are sincere in deploring the terrible calamity to India—I submit that this sympathy does not go far enough. I would humbly tell the First Lord of the Treasury that, in spite of the great cost of the war in South Africa, to which we object, you could not go to a centre of the working class population in any part of England where you would not get unanimous approval of a free grant to the Indian Government for the purposes of famine relief—a grant of five millions, aye, of ten millions, if that sum is needed. I was rather surprised at the peculiar way in which the First Lord of the Treasury dealt with the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon, who thought, rightly, that if we could spend fifty or sixty millions on the war in South Africa, we ought to spare a million or two for the relief of India. The right hon. Gentleman says that that was a policy of the greater the burden in one direction the more extended should the appeal to the British taxpayer be in another. The hon.

Member for Exeter gave us some very wise advice, and told us what was healthy and what unhealthy finance. He is a great authority, doubtless, but I wish that he would apply his finance theories in this country as well as to other countries. He has shown no great objection to grants-in-aid here and grants-in-aid there in England and Ireland. But when he told us of the probable bankruptcy of the British Empire he had to admit that the country for which we ask this grant-in-aid is the one part of the Empire which costs us nothing. We are told in solemn tones that a grant of five millions from this House would rob the people of India of their proper dignity and self-respect. But what dignity and self-respect could these terrible crowds of famished people have! All the argument about sound finance and self-respect was absurd when applied to 300 millions of people who had no more control over their own government than they have over the inhabitants of France. I think that British rule has been on the whole good for the Indian people; but does anybody in this House believe that we hold India for the benefit of the Indian people? No, we hold it for Imperial purposes. I do submit that we would be acting consistently with the highest and soundest finance—that we would be not only giving vent to a healthy sentiment but exercising sound justice in making this grant, and on these grounds I support the motion. I was surprised that the hon. Member for Bethnal Green had been disappointed at the result of his application to the Archbishops, who have referred him to the Mansion House Fund. Nothing could have been more reasonable than such an answer as that coming from such a quarter! I regard this help to India as part of our Imperial obligations, and those who vote against the motion will be the true Little Englanders.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it appears, by the Accounts laid before this House, that the total revenue of India for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1899, was £67,595,815; that the total expenditure in India and in England charged against revenue was £64,954,942; that there was a surplus of revenue over expenditure of £2,640,873; and that the capital outlay on railways and irrigation works not charged against revenue was £3,279,316. — (Secretary Lord George Hamilton.)

Resolution to be reported.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1:—

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central) said that the Amendment he now proposed to move was to be taken in connection with one which appeared a little lower down in the Paper, and was moved in accordance with the pledge he gave approving the recommendations of the Committee.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, to leave out 'portion of.'"—(Mr. G. W. Balfour.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 11, to leave out from 'them' to the second 'in,' in line 12."—(Mr. G. W. Balfour.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said that this was an attempt to prevent by statute the teaching of the Irish language. He had never known of a case in which an Amendment of this kind had been moved, except in the case of the Pigott Commission. Where was the necessity for the Amendment unless it were to limit and restrict the action of the Commission?

Amendment agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he was afraid that the form of the rules would exclude the schools of the Christian Brothers from the benefits of the Act, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment he now proposed.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 14, at end, to insert, 'Nothing in any rule made in pursuance of this section shall exclude from participation in the benefits of the said Acts any school which would be entitled to participate in such benefits if this Act had not passed.'"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said if the Amendment were accepted the difficulty which the hon. Member believed to exist as to want of a definition of the word "school" would remain. He could assure the hon. Member that the Government did not wish to exclude the schools of the Christian Brothers from the benefits of the Act.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that if he withdrew the Amendment he would like to have a definite assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that this was an improper use to make of the Act. He thought if the Rules were laid on the Table it would be an effective preservation, and therefore he begged to withdraw this Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 :—

MR. T. M. HEALY said when the original Act was introduced, considerable sums were granted in different parts of Ireland for prizes, but from year to year those sums had been diminished until now, instead of a boy winning a £40 scholarship as a first prize, the amount had fallen so low as to be only some £25. It was said that that was owing to the fund having become bankrupt, but Irish Members found that it could still be drawn upon for other purposes. There was now an attempt to pay pensions to those who had been responsible for education under the Intermediate Education Act of thirty years ago. They were no doubt deserving persons, but if they were deserving of pensions they should be pensioned out of the English funds and not the Irish. It had always been laid down that a pension was deferred pay, and if that were so he did not see how persons who had never entered into a contract with the State could be entitled to a pension. They were not Civil Servants, and they should not be pensioned out of the Irish Church Fund. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, lines 1 and 2, to leave out the words 'out of the funds placed at their disposal grant,' and insert the words 'recommend grants of,' instead thereof."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR justified giving a permissive power to the Board to grant pensions to its officers, stating that a reendation in this sense was made by Commissioners some years ago, and proposal was in the interests of education itself. It was very desirable that offices should be pensionable, and before he hoped the hon. Gentleman not press his Amendment.

FLYNN (Cork, N.) hoped the Member would go to a division. He spoke upon this clause as an experience on the Bill. The officials were £800 a year for doing work which either continuous nor laborious, and ought to insure their lives on the present policy system. He really objected to this species of foster-fatherly sympathy towards these poor afflicted people! It seemed to him that it was possible to bring in a single Bill dealing with any phase of Irish life—social, political, literary, or what not without it being burdened with annuities clauses or clauses saving or preserving vested interests. The right hon. Gentleman was determined to create vested interests, he should let the Irish Church Fund to do it; it could go to the British Treasury. The report of the Commission never contemplated such retiring allowances; and he stated that the right hon. Gentleman would either accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Louth or delete the clause altogether from the

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that this clause had nothing whatever to do with the rest of the Bill, which was intended to improve the educational system of Ireland. There never had been any agitation in favour of these pensions, and he never had been suggested in any way; minute, so far as he knew. He was, he maintained, a very strong feeling in regard to engrafting an Education Bill a system of pensions to public servants whose allocation had been of no value, whose names were not known, and whose deeds were not notorious. He did not think the people of Ireland would be much the better off after this Act was passed than before it. It was not going to create a new heaven and a new earth in Ireland. He had no doubt these gentlemen were excellent Tories, but was that a reason for granting them superannuation allowances? When dealing with the Dublin Corporation Bill, which sought powers to grant certain superannuation allowances, some gentleman connected with Ireland exclaimed "that is a job;" but when pensions were to be given to some gentlemen connected with some particular Tory Department, these same oracles cried, "Oh, they deserve it!" If these excellent and most admirable Tories must be pensioned, let it be done by the British Government, and not out of this miserable Irish Church Fund.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said that so far as he was concerned he knew nothing of these gentlemen personally, and he knew nothing about their religion or their politics. The proposal was made, not in the interests of any individual, but in the interests of education itself. It was not desirable that they should have gentlemen in the position of assistant-commissioners filling a non-pensionable office under the ordinary Civil Service rules at a certain age. The Government had introduced this provision at the very earnest request of the Commissioners themselves, and it was in the interest of the service that it was submitted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why not put it on an English fund?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said that at the present time these salaries were paid, not out of an English fund, but out of the income of the Intermediate Education Board, and a large part of that income was derived from taxation. These persons were appointed on the distinct understanding that their office was pensionable, and it was practically impossible to get rid of any of these officials except they were pensioned.

MR. T. M. HEALY asserted that if they were civil servants they would have to pass competitive examinations in order to secure their appointments, but they had not done so. They were appointed through favouritism, and got their appointments through the nomination of their particular friends in the Tory party. They were appointed because they had obtained the ear and favour of the ruling class in Ireland, and now at the end of their time it was said that these gentlemen who obtained their offices through pure favouritism were to be pensioned because they were civil servants. They had no claim to a pension. Yet Ireland had to provide for them. It was typical of the way in which Ireland was treated. This was the penalty Ireland had to pay for a new system of education. They had to pension a number of superannuated frauds to the extent of £1,000 a year, because they wished to give their children technical education.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Captain Donelan and Mr.
Patrick O'Brien.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not propose to move the next Amendment, but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will incorporate into this clause the words of the preceding clause, and the words "with the approval of the Treasury."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Yes.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 6, after the word 'grant,' to insert the words 'with the approval of the Treasury.'"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. T. M. Healy.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that they had now come to the last Amendment on the Paper, and he hoped the Government would not in any way derogate from the undertaking they had given, but would accept it at once. It was a very reasonable Amendment.

New clause :—

"The Board under this Act shall, in addition to the members already appointed, consist of five additional members, who shall be nominated by the Lord Lieutenant."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

brought up and read the first and second time, and added.

Bill reported, as amended; to be considered upon Monday next.

NAVAL RESERVE BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) said that by the Act of 1859 Parliament specifically stated the number of men to be engaged in the Naval Reserve at 30,000. He believed that up to this time we had not got that number. But this Bill authorised the raising of an indefinite number of men—anything from 15,000 to 50,000 men.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square) said that the number of Volunteers of the second class was fixed at 15,000. The other class included pensioners who were in future liable to be called out for a certain number of days drill in the year, but they could not say what that number of pensioners would be.

MR. CALDWELL said he quite admitted that. Under the Royal Navy Act of 1859 they authorised the raising of 30,000. Under this Bill they authorised 15,000 men, and in addition they were going to call out the old pensioners on stated occasions. But what about the artificers? The point, however, to which he wished to direct the attention of the Committee was that by the Bill they were authorising the Admiralty to raise an indefinite number of men without the authority of Parliament. In that they were departing from the ordinary constitutional rule that Parliament should have the control of the men engaged or enlisted as soldiers or sailors whether in the Regular Army and Navy or in the Reserve. It was a new departure, and whether it was right or wrong, it was a departure that it was hardly right to expect the Committee to discuss at 1.30 in the morning. Every man who was in receipt of a pension was liable to be called out in times of emergency, so that the principle was already in force; but in future the pensioner would have to drill during the year, which made all the difference. He desired to move to leave out Sub-section 3, in order to elicit some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman. That sub-section made one important change by making the term of service under the Naval Reserve Act five years and no longer. At the end of that time the men were entitled to their discharge, subject to their being engaged in active service.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.) pointed out that the enlistment was for five years, at the end of which period a man could take his discharge, or could re-enlist for a further five years and continue to do so until he had reached the age of fifty-five. The Reserve was an entirely different one to that which existed under the Act of 1859.

MR. CALDWELL called the attention of the hon. Gentleman to the fact that he had lost sight of the fact that it was plainly stated in the Bill that Section 2 of the 1859 Act should not apply to this. It was plain to him that the Government had brought in this Bill having evidently no knowledge of its contents, and no one could tell what the result of it would be.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) thought it was desirable that the House should know what was meant, because it did appear that all the Government was doing was to repeal the Act which would have limited the enlistment for five years. It made a great difference with regard to the efficiency of the Reserve. How was a man to escape from it? Did his service extend until there was a vacancy in Greenwich Hospital for him?

*MR. MACARTNEY said that after the Bill became law there would be an option given to the men, either to take their discharge or to volunteer for another five years service. At the end of each five years they would be entitled to their discharge, or they could re-enlist. In some cases the enlistment would not be five years, because if a man's time expired when he was fifty-two he would not be eligible to serve for more than another three years.

*SIR J. COLOMB understood that the repeal of Sub-section 2 only referred to marine pensioners.

MR. CALDWELL saw nothing in the Act with respect to five years, and so far as the present Bill was concerned the measure which exempted men from the five years clause—Section 2 of the Royal Naval Reserve Volunteer Act—did not apply to money received under this Act. It appeared to him that a very great change was about to be made. He desired to raise another point under Sub-section 4, the meaning of which was that the men in certain cases would be treated under the Military Services Act, and not under the Act of 1859. In this case another very great change was being made in the existing system by this Bill, and no explanation had been given for that change, nor was the matter limited to service on shore.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) said if the men were at sea they would come under the Military Service Act, and if on shore, under the Army Act.

Bill reported without amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

COUNTY COURTS (IRELAND) BILL [Lords].

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged, Bill withdrawn.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION (ISLE OF MAN) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CALDWELL asked whether teachers in the Isle of Man who had got a certificate from the Department were teachers in Great Britain, or were they under a different system? Again, were the services of the teachers in the Isle of Man to be regarded as part of the services for pension?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley) said that in the Isle of Man the Education Code was adopted, and the teachers were certificated by the Department in the same way as in England; but they had none of the privileges of the Act of 1898. The object of the present Bill was to provide that the service in whole or in part in the Isle of Man should be recorded as service on which superannuation was based. The Bill was necessary because the education authorities in the Isle of Man had great difficulty in getting good teachers, because their services in the island were not recorded for superannuation purposes. The Bill had been framed by arrangement with the Treasury.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he means to abolish the Parliaments of the Isle of Man and Jersey?

[No reply was given.]

*LORD GREVILLE: I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name to Clause 25. If sub-sections such as are included in my Amendment are not inserted the Waterford Corporation will be deprived of the benefits which they have enjoyed for years past. The Amendment will not in any way injure the Bill, and I trust your Lordships will agree to it.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 25, pages 14 and 15, to leave out Sub-sections (6) and (7), and to insert the following sub-sections:—

"(6) The company shall give on application so far as they themselves are concerned through bookings with through rates and fares for traffic of every description via the port of Waterford to and from all places in Great Britain from or to which they can be reasonably required.

"(7) The said through bookings and through rates and fares may be applied for by the Waterford Corporation or by the Waterford Commissioners or by any incorporated steamship company regularly trading with the port of Waterford or by any other person interested in such through traffic.

"(8) The Waterford Corporation and the Waterford Commissioners shall not oppose any application to Parliament which the Great Western Railway Company may make for relief from the obligation to continue to provide or afford a daily service by steamer as provided by Section 70 of the Fishguard and Rosslare Railways and Harbours Act, 1898."

—(Lord Greville.)

EARL SPENCER: I am afraid it is rather difficult to explain the position of the mover of the Amendment as well as that of the Joint Committee who considered the Bill, but I think I must venture to do so. The Bill is a very important one, and I will admit that Limerick, Waterford, and other places are deeply interested in it. The Committee, therefore, went carefully into all these matters; they sat for a great many days, and this matter was discussed at great length before them. I do not know whether my noble friend is going to press this Amendment, but I think it right that I should state exactly what it is. Two years ago a very important Act was passed in respect of the Rosslare and Fishguard line, which immensely affected the whole traffic of the railways in the south of Ireland. That Act established a line of steamboats from Rosslare to Fishguard, and a good many conditions were imposed on the promoters, one being that the Great Southern and Western should give the line all the traffic they could. That Act will affect in an enormous degree the whole trade and commerce of the south and west of Ireland, and since it has been passed it has very much affected the position of the different railway companies in Ireland, almost necessitating the bringing forward of the Bill now before your Lordships. One of the clauses of the Bill is intended to protect all through traffic as before, wherever it goes. That clause remains. There was another clause affecting the future, but after a good deal of consultation and discussion the Committee decided against it. One of the clauses to protect the Harbour Commissioners of Waterford was that the Great Western of England, which is in close alliance with the Great Southern and Western, were to run a daily service of steamboats to Waterford as well as to Fishguard, and in that clause the through traffic obtained was to be carried by their lines to their own stations, or wherever their lines came in England. That was as the Bill came before us, but the Great Western of England opposed that clause, considering it hard and onerous upon them. The Committee considered the grievance, and came to the conclusion that the Great Western had something to say on the matter. Therefore they inserted a clause saying that, until the Great Western were relieved of their obligation to run a daily service of steamboats to Waterford, the same conditions should be imposed upon the Great Southern over the new amalgamated line as were placed on them in respect of their own lines in the Rosslare and Fishguard Bill. With every desire to give full protection to the different places, we came to the conclusion that that clause would be more just. My noble friend wishes to alter that. He seeks for a through traffic clause to all places in England, quite independently of the clause which was inserted in the Rosslare and Fishguard Bill, and then promises that if that is granted the Harbour Commissioners of Waterford will engage not to oppose any Bill brought forward by the Great Western. The Committee have fully considered this, and are not in a position to give way on that point. I confess that I do not think any great hardship will be imposed upon Waterford if the Bill stands as it is. I therefore oppose the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): My Lords, I think it is hardly worth while to say anything in support of the view taken by the noble Earl who has just spoken, except to remind the House that this Bill was referred to a specially strong Joint Committee of both Houses, who sat for twenty-nine days, and that this particular question occupied a considerable time. I cannot believe that your Lordships will be likely to reverse the decision arrived at after so much deliberation.

Amendment negatived.

LORD GREVILLE: The object of the new clause which I now beg to move is to put a check on the working of the company, and to give to the Treasury powers which will secure the proper working of the line.

Moved—

"To insert as a new clause:—'If the Treasury shall be of opinion that the company is not properly working, maintaining, and developing the traffic on or over the railways of the Waterford Company, or over any railways heretofore worked by the Waterford Company, or that the through or local rates or fares charged upon those railways are unreasonable, they may call upon the company to make such alterations in its mode of working, maintaining, and developing traffic, or in the rates or fares charged, as they may think fit, and should the company fail to make such alterations within a reasonable time after notice to it to that effect, the Treasury may prefer a complaint against the company to the Railway and Canal Commission for an order directing such alterations to be made, and thereupon the said Commission may make such order on the complaint as to them may seem fit.'"—(Lord Greville.)

EARL SPENCER: I am afraid I must also oppose this Amendment. It involves a new principle in railroad legislation, and I do not myself believe that it is at all necessary. Under clauses in both Bills there is ample power to refer to arbitration any disputes as to the facilities—the wide facilities—which have been granted. The proposed clause would effect a sweeping change, and has never been before the Committee. The matter is of vast importance, and would make a revolution in railway legislation, at all events, in Ireland. I do not express an opinion as to whether it is right or wrong—it has not been discussed before the Committee—but I think the existing protection clauses sufficient.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: This clause appears on the Paper now for the first time, and the first I saw of it was a type-written copy which was handed to me just before the House met. It is entirely out of the question to move it without giving notice.

Amendment negatived.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN AND WATERFORD AND CENTRAL IRELAND RAILWAY COMPANIES AMALGAMATION BILL [H.L.].

Moved, "That Standing Order No. 144 be dispensed with in regard to this Bill."
—(The Earl of Cork.)

On Question, motion agreed to.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(The Earl of Cork.)

LORD GREVILLE: In rising to move that the Bill be read a third time this day three months it is very difficult for me in a few words to explain to your Lordships what took the Committee twenty-nine days to inquire into. But the Committee did not hear many points of interest in connection with the subject. A line was authorised in 1896 from Mountmellick to Mullingar, through the very centre of Ireland. The people of Mullingar and that region, whom I represent, wished the Committee to give them an extension of the power to build that line. Lord de Vesci and myself appeared before the noble Earl's Committee, but the Committee did not think it necessary to hear other witnesses who could have been produced, including two Irish Members of Parliament. I can quite understand that the Committee were weary and sick of the whole thing, but I cannot see why they would not consider the Mullingar grievance. It is an Irish grievance, and therefore, perhaps, not much thought of over here. The Mullingar line did not suit the octopus, the Great Southern and Western, which now has the whole of the south in its greedy tentacles, as it might be antagonistic to the Midland Great Western. The Committee have done an injustice to the centre of Ireland in not imposing the construction of this line on the promoters; and those who, with myself, originally obtained the powers in 1896 have lost much money over the project. It is all thrown away because the Joint Committee were too weary to go into the question. I have had many letters on the subject. A gentleman of great influence in Ireland writes—

"I do not know how the committees are formed in Parliament, but this one must have been formed to give everything to the Great Southern. No one on it understood the wants or wishes of Ireland in regard to this matter. No wonder we want Home Rule."

I would ask whether a clause could not be inserted which would give the people of the centre of Ireland the power to revive the Act of 1896 which at present is virtually dead. I am glad that the Committee have not accepted the demand of the Midland that they should be prevented from ever making the line, but I would suggest that the Great Southern be put under an obligation to introduce a Bill in the next session of Parliament to obtain an extension of time for the construction of the line from Mountmellick to Mullingar authorised by the Waterford and Central (Ireland) Act, 1896, and to use their best endeavours to obtain such powers, and on such powers being obtained, to proceed forthwith to construct such railway.

Amendment moved—

"To leave out 'now,' and insert at the end of the motion 'this day three months.'"—
(Lord Greville.)

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, with regard to what my noble friend has said as to the Committee being so exhausted by the length of the inquiry and the weather that they would not inquire fully into this matter, I must give an entire and complete denial to the assertion. I confess that I was not very well when the inquiry began, but I came out of it much better in health. We were not deterred by the hot weather, or by anything else, from doing what we considered best in the interests of the people of Ireland. I sympathise with my noble friend in the original desire to extend the line from Mountmellick to Mullingar; but what has happened? The Act of 1896 was obtained, but the company were unable to raise money outside their own capital to carry the line to Mountmellick. The public would not support the rest of the extension, and the powers under the Bill have expired. The compulsory powers for the acquisition of land expired on 21st May last year. No doubt the power of making the line goes on till the 21st May next, but it will disappear then. That alone is, I think, a condemnation of the line. I am very sorry for my noble friend, and particularly for the friends whom he encouraged to subscribe to this line; but I am afraid they have made a very bad commercial speculation. They were not supported by the public, and the line has been practically killed not by this Bill, but under the Act of 1896. I, as chairman, may have been responsible in Committee for stopping counsel when they desired to go into irrelevant matters and into matters which the Committee had heard over and over again, but I entirely deny that I stopped counsel when they wanted to make a case. I entirely deny that I stopped the free discussion or the free speech of counsel. The Central of Ireland is an impecunious, almost a bankrupt concern—it was so poor that it could not run passenger trains without cattle—and it would have been a strong order to compel the company taking it over to construct a line with which the public had already refused to have anything to do.

On Question whether "now" shall stand part of the motion, resolved in the affirmative. Bill read 3^d accordingly; Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

STRENGTH AND ORGANISATION OF HOME DEFENCES.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I beg to ask the Prime Minister—(1) whether he or his colleagues have ever received information or expressions of opinion from reliable sources confirming the view of one of our foreign military attachés, recently quoted in debate, to the effect that—

It is all important that England should be strong and unassailable in the month of November next;

(2) whether he is of opinion that the European situation is now less alarming than it seemed to him on the 9th of May last when he spoke to the Primrose League as follows—

"It is not necessarily because in themselves they are more important, but if you look around you will see that the elements and causes of menace and peril are, though slowly, accumulating, and may accumulate to such a point as to require our most earnest and active effort to repel them";

(3) whether, as Prime Minister responsible for our national safety, he has carefully inquired into our home land defensive means and organisation, and has satisfied himself that these are such as, failing the Fleet, will render all attempts at invasion by any hostile nation futile and impossible of success; (4) whether, if not satisfied as to the sufficiency and organisation of our home land defences, he will cause such measures to be taken as will give us the required security against the possibility of successful invasion by any hostile Power. I have to apologise to my noble friend the Prime Minister for venturing to put these questions on the Paper, but I think he and your Lordships will admit that the matters to which they refer are sufficiently important to justify my having done so. I think your Lordships will also admit that, as we are approaching the close of the present session, it is desirable that we should receive, if possible, from the Prime Minister, a more comforting assurance as to the state of our home defences. In the few words which I think it necessary to utter in putting these questions to the noble Marquess I shall, I hope, avoid saying anything that could possibly give offence to the susceptibilities of any nation; indeed, I propose not to refer to any nation, but to make my remarks general on the subject of home defence. It will be remembered that in the debate on 20th February last on the Militia Ballot resolution,* I quoted from a letter I had received from one of our military attachés abroad, in which he expressed his satisfaction that I was endeavouring to get a Volunteer Reserve, and then used these words, which I have placed on the Paper:—

Within the last three days I have received another letter from my correspondent in which he says he still holds to what he wrote eight or nine months ago. This seems to me to establish a rather serious and critical situation, especially as I have been informed that Her Majesty's Government have received—I do not know whether they attach weight to it or not—similar information from many quarters. In February last my noble friend Lord Rosebery, defending a motion designed to make the Ballot Bill workable, said, in almost passionate language, that he considered that we were in a national crisis, or used words to that effect. My noble friend the Earl of Kimberley followed in the course of that debate, and also used words as to the importance of the crisis in which we found ourselves, and argued that it was most desirable that we should make our Militia strong for home defence. All this only leads to what I am about to say. On the 25th May the Prime Minister, addressing the members of the Primrose League, used the words quoted in the second paragraph of my question—

"But if you look around you will see that the elements and causes of menace and peril are, though slowly, accumulating, and may accumulate to such a point as to require our most earnest and active efforts to repel them."

I have now to ask whether anything has occurred since May last to modify the view of my noble friend the Prime Minister. The danger we run is this: that these evils will go on accumulating until the thundercloud bursts. The question which arises is: shall we be prepared to meet it? Has the noble Marquess come to the conclusion, after full inquiry, that our home defences are in a thoroughly satisfactory state? There are, in this country, two schools of national defence. My noble friend Lord Rosebery and others have been at Eton, and they will remember that at Eton there are two sets of boys. One set delight in the river, and say the river is everything; the other set take their pleasure in the playing-field. Those who devote themselves to the river are called "wet bobs," and those who look to the playing fields for their amusement are termed "dry bobs"; and the "wet bobs" are apt to look down on the "dry bobs." As it is at Eton so it is in these schools, if I may so call them, of national defence. You have one school that swears by the Navy and the Navy alone, who say that all we want is a strong Navy, and that if we have a Navy stronger than any other two this nation is perfectly safe. But there is this inconsistency in their views. If it is necessary to anchor part of our Navy in the Channel for the protection of our shores, we pro tanto diminish the power of our Fleet for operations elsewhere, no matter how large that Fleet may be. When they are asked, "Are you so satisfied with what the Navy can do for the protection of our shores that you are ready to give up all home defences?" they immediately reply, "No." Therefore, the whole of the Navy "wet bob" argument falls to the ground, because we cannot trust absolutely to the Fleet. I am not ashamed to say that in this matter of defence I am a "dry bob." I quite feel that we ought to have the largest possible Navy for the purpose not of home defence, but of pursuing the enemy's fleet and commerce, shutting them up in ports, and protecting our own commerce. But I want the country to be absolutely independent of the Navy for home defence, and the home defences to be so organised as to give us—to quote the words of my question—the required security against the possibility of successful invasion by any hostile Power. I have asked my noble friend to himself see whether we are in that state. We never have been in that state since 1815. Everything that has been done since has shown it. What was the Duke of Wellington's letter to Sir John Burgoyne but an admission that we were not in a satisfactory state so far as our home defences were concerned? What was his last speech in your Lordships' House? It was in favour of the Militia Ballot Bill of Lord Palmerston, and contained an admission that we were not strong at home and required an efficient Militia. What was General Peel's letter which summoned the Volunteer force but an admission that as things then were we were not in a satisfactory state as regards home defences? What was Lord Cardwell's Army Bill but an admission that we were not, in the year 1870, in a satisfactory state of home defence? But how as to now? Will my noble friend be able to say that we are in a satisfactory state now? The noble Marquess sitting on his right, the Secretary for War, is satisfied that we are not in a satisfactory state for home defence, for every measure he brings in is what he calls a measure of emergency; and the last thing, apparently, from the answer he gave yesterday, is his proposal to put the whole military system into the crucible or smelting-pot. The noble Marquess shakes his head, but is it not putting the military system into the smelting-pot when he is going to do away with the Militia Reserve and to change the constitution of the Militia, so that instead of being only for home defence it is to be liable to be sent abroad? That may be right or it may be wrong, but it is a revolution in our Army organisation and in the principle of the defence of this country. I venture then to ask my noble friend if he has inquired into this question and compared the facts obtained as regards our means of defence with the means of aggression of other Powers. If he has done that, I hope he will be able to answer the questions by saying that our home defences and organisation are such as, failing the Fleet, will render all attempts at invasion by any hostile nation futile and impossible of success. I have only to say one word with regard to the last question. If my noble friend's inquiry has not satisfied him that we are in that state, will he take care that we are put in a condition of absolute security against the possibility of successful invasion by any hostile power? To contemplate, not invasion, but the possibility of the threat of invasion, and preparations for invasion such as were made in the early part of last century is something to give one a cold shudder as to the effect it would have in this country. There was an excellent book—I strongly advise your Lordships to read it—published in 1852 by Sir Francis Head, Bart., entitled "The Defenceless State of Great Britain." After showing the dangers we ran in the early part of last century, he has two chapters on the "Capture of London." The first chapter begins as follows—

"As soon as by a few quivering motions of two needles there had almost simultaneously appeared upon the white dials of all the electric telegraphs throughout the United Kingdom the three words 'They are landed,' what a variety of sensations would be created in the hearts of fundholders, landowners, place holders, owners of property of every description !”

One set of gentlemen he has not referred to, and those are the gentlemen who live in Pall Mall. I wonder in such a case what their feelings would be. My opinion is that they would decorate the lamp-posts in Pall Mall. We owe it not only to our homes, not only to everything that is dear to us, not only to the past history of this country, but we owe it to our colonies, who have so nobly come forward in the Empire's defence, and whose sons have shown their gallantry and so freely shed their blood in South Africa ; we owe it to them as well as to ourselves that we should be strong at the heart and impregnable at home. I do not know whom the noble Marquess has consulted with reference to the answer he will give to these questions—I hope they are not all official answers from Pall Mall—but I wish he would consult the illustrious Duke who was for so many years the Field Marshal Commander-in-Chief of the Army. If he consulted the noble Duke I should be very surprised if he did not find that his views on home defence and the duties of the Government in that respect—which are to enforce the existing law, and not to go tinkering and tailoring with some other law—are not far from being in accordance with those with which on more than one occasion I have troubled your Lordships. I now venture to ask the questions standing in my name.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I shall best comply with the wish of my noble friend that I should answer the questions which he has put on the Notice Paper by taking them one by one. The first question is, “Whether I or my colleagues”—I cannot answer for my colleagues—“have ever received information or expressions of opinion from reliable sources confirming the view of one of our foreign military attachés”—I wonder who that person is ; I know nothing about him—“recently quoted in debate”—yes, quoted by the noble Lord. And he has the courage to come here and quote himself as an authority, for he has no other authority whatever—

The Earl of Wemyss.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I beg your pardon ; I do not quote myself as an authority.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: You quoted it ; nobody else did.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: What I quoted was a letter from one of your own officials.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Who is he ?

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I decline to say ; you have no right to ask me.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: You have no right to say that.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I beg your pardon—

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Lord has no right to use a private letter in this way, and quote it in this House as an evidence of a public fact, when he cannot bring the testimony of the man from whom it comes as evidence that it is not a pure invention. I have only to reply that I have never heard that “it is all-important that England should be strong and unassailable in the month of November next.” I believe there is to be a great collection of shooting stars in the early part of November—that is the only peculiarity in the month of November that I know of that we need apprehend. The noble Lord then asks me whether it is my opinion that the European situation is now less alarming than when in the month of May I used certain words of which he quotes a very small portion. My Lords, I did my best on that occasion to express myself clearly, and I was anxious to avoid precisely that misconception into which the noble Lord has fallen. I pointed out at that time what was well known to everybody—that the attitude of foreign Powers towards us was absolutely correct, and showed the utmost goodwill towards this country ; that we had in this respect nothing to complain of ; that there was nothing in their action from which we could deduce any unfavourable inferences. I stated that in debate, I think in answer to the noble Lord opposite, and I repeated it afterwards at the meeting in Albert Hall, to which the noble Lord has referred. At the same time, I drew attention to another class of phenomena having nothing to do with the attitude of the Governments of the day. It was impossible to conceal from our eyes, especially then, that there was, not assuredly in the language of Governments or statesmen, but in the organs of popular opinion in many parts of the world, and especially in Europe, that which indicated a state of feeling towards this country which could not but fill us with feelings of apprehension, or at all events of regret, and which we could not dismiss from our minds. The object I had in drawing the attention of my fellow-countrymen to this state of things was that they should not allow themselves to rely too entirely upon the correct and benevolent attitude of Governments, but bear in mind that in the long run Governments are influenced by the feeling of the people over whom they rule, and that if that feeling continued hostile to us we must be prepared to take account of the phenomenon in making our preparations. That was undoubtedly true then, but nobody, I should have thought, would have read that speech without knowing that I was not pointing to any immediate danger or necessity for immediate precautions. The mere fact that again and again I carefully guarded myself from seeming to imply that there was anything in the conduct or attitude of foreign countries to cause us disquiet or apprehension, showed that it was not to immediate danger that I was pointing the attention of my countrymen, but that I was urging upon them a general consideration of the duties imposed on every nation by the increase of means of communication in the present day, and urging that the apprehensions which might be caused now from these circumstances and from the proximity of danger were greater than they would have been many years ago, and that, therefore, we were bound, not by any sudden revolutionary measures of defence, not by any startling efforts or any violent change of the policy we had pursued, but by a steady concentration of our view upon the special danger of our own generation and our own time—we were bound to bring our nation gradually to the performance of those duties of self-defence which have been long imposed by necessity upon other nations of the world, and which, perhaps, have lain upon us in a less formidable character in consequence of the defence which we enjoy from the possession of the sea as a barrier. I am not going to trouble the House with reading my speech made at the Albert Hall—I would not so waste the time of the House—but no one can read that speech without seeing that I did not speak then of any imminent pressing danger, or of any precautions that required immediate adoption. I was trying to guide, so far as it was given me to do so, the minds of my fellow-countrymen into the conduct with respect to national defence which the changing conditions of national security are slowly pressing on the nation to which we belong. That is what I have to say of my speech to the Primrose League. I do not wish any noble Lord, unless he chooses, to undertake the somewhat severe condition of reading it in its entirety, but I am convinced he will not, if he does, attribute to it such a false interpretation as that which has commended itself to the noble Lord. Then he asks me whether I have satisfied myself that our home land defences are such as, failing the fleet, would render all attempts at invasion by any hostile nation futile and impossible of success. I really do not know how I should begin to address myself to that inquiry. Nobody has yet succeeded in invading this country since William the Conqueror unless he has had assistance from inside. Of course, that is not what the noble Lord meant; he has some fanciful or personal test of national security which he requires us to fulfil. But I maintain that the onus is on the other side; it is for him to show the dangers to which he says we are exposed, and if he shows this correctly, then I admit he is doing good and patriotic service in calling attention to their existence, and I fully acknowledge the duty which lies upon us above all other things of preventing any real and substantial danger of the kind. But I cannot prove a negative. I cannot prove there is no danger unless he indicates to me from what side it is to come, or in consequence of what circumstances that danger exists. I do not profess to be able to go into the minute details of our national defence by sea or by land. I am afraid that in our complex civilisation it is necessary for us to trust largely to the testimony and to the vigilance of experts in whom you have confidence; and I should rather refer, and I hold it to be my duty to refer, in the first instance to the great precaution which I have had a share in taking for protecting this country, and that is by recommending an adequate and thoroughly trustworthy head of the War Office for the defence of the country. I cannot profess to tell the noble Lord whether all our muskets are of the right calibre, or whether all our guns are of the best pattern that can be adopted—that is not my business. I must in such matters rely on the assurances of experts. As far as my judgment goes, as far as my knowledge carries me—I do not think it is very far—it appears to me that our defensive systems are quite as effective and in as thoroughly satisfactory a condition as ever they have been before. I suppose the fact that they have led us up to this particular point of security without any serious danger or apprehension may give us confidence in the future. I do not profess to have examined the details of every circumstance of defence; I can only say that, as far as they have come under my observation they are thoroughly satisfactory and such as to give us sufficient confidence in the future. The noble Earl appears to think that he has made out an excellent case by speaking of all the changes which all the Ministers for a hundred years past have from time to time proposed for increasing and developing our national defences. Of course such proposals have been made, and of course such proposals are now being made by my noble friend the Minister for War. If it is the doctrine of the noble Lord that you cannot propose any amendment of your defensive system without admitting that that defensive system is unsatisfactory, of course you may much simplify the duty of defence and of legislation in respect to Army matters. But that is an absurd test to apply. We believe that we are satisfactorily defended; we believe that we have been so defended for some time past, and we appeal to history as our test, but we do not think that we are by that fact relieved from the duty of constantly watching the organisation over which we preside and trying to introduce into it every improvement which experience or reflection can induce us to adopt. That, I think, is the only course possible with respect to national defence, which manifestly must be progressive, and the merits of which up to a certain extent must depend upon hypothetical dangers such as the noble Lord has adopted to himself. We do not see these dangers, we do see the necessity for constant improvement, and as we go on, and as facts and the guidance of experts induce us to modify our system, we shall not fail to do so; but we indignantly repudiate the insinuation that, because we attempt constantly to make improvements and add to the efficiency of our national defence, we are therefore admitting that we all this time have been sitting down under an inadequate system, and that most serious dangers have really beset us in the past, though we professed the greatest security. I need not say that I am not dissatisfied as to the sufficiency and the organisation of our home land defences; that I do not admit that inefficiency is proved by the fact of our having attempted to develop, expand, and strengthen our system. We shall continue so to develop and expand it. But we cannot for a moment accept the suggestion that we have not taken, as our predecessors have taken, the required security against the possibility of a successful invasion by any hostile Power, which was only once dreamed of, and idly dreamed of, by Napoleon at the culmination of his career, and which no foreign Power now dreams of as a possible contingency for an enemy of England to contemplate. I do not admit the possibility of successful invasion on the part of any hostile Power. If the noble Earl can prove it, can show it, and give us ground for believing it, let him do so; but if he cannot do so, I do not think that he serves his country by the constant repetition of impossible apprehensions and unfounded complaints.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, I cannot help regretting that the noble Marquess the Prime Minister has imported so much heat into his reply to my noble friend on the Cross Benches. I am not here to defend the motion or the questions of my noble friend. He is imbued with a perpetual youth and a perpetual vitality which put his questions beyond the reach of my observation or criticism. But I confess I think he would have been better advised if he had left out the reference to the letter of the anonymous military attaché, who I trust will always remain anonymous. But at the same time, he touched upon a point as to which the Government seem to be quite unaware—I mean with regard to the anxiety which is felt in the country. That anxiety has been greatly intensified by the speech which the noble Marquess delivered to the Primrose League, and which, no doubt, caused a much greater impression than could have been caused by the remarks of an irresponsible person. The noble Marquess wishes us to go home and read it in its entirety. I do not think I should sleep to-night if I did; at any rate, I do not propose to take that course; but what I do recollect distinctly, after my first, and probably my second, perusal of that speech, was the extraordinarily inadequate conclusion up to which these depressing arguments of the noble Marquess led. What he said, and said with perfect truth, was that though the attitudes of the Governments on the Continent were essentially correct, yet they were the dams to a flood of public opinion hostile to this country which might at any moment break down those dams and sweep in a torrent—I think the metaphor is his own—against the rocks of this island. Now, my Lords, after all, if that be the condition of things—I think it may have ameliorated since then, but not altogether, for no one can put a foot on the Continent of Europe anywhere without knowing that that is the state of things, and that we are surrounded with an atmosphere of hatred unprecedented, I hope, in the history of this country—if that be the condition of things, the conclusion of the noble Marquess was totally inadequate. It is not enough to tell the Primrose League, however numerous, however efficient, and however intelligent that body may be, to form itself spontaneously into rifle clubs to protect our liberties, our properties, and our national existence. I know it has been said on high authority that we are only hated because we are so strong—the argument apparently being that under former Governments we were feeble and beloved—but that now because we are so strong, because we have so vast a body of our national resources locked up 7,000 miles away, and because we have the prospect of another great body of our national resources being locked up still further away—because we are now so strong we are now hated. Suppose we are hated and not so strong! On what does our strength rest? What are the assurances that we have had that we are so strong? The noble Marquess gives us his assurance on that point, but he will forgive me for saying that that will carry no conviction to my mind whatever. He was asked, with a directness which was, perhaps, more enthusiastic than discreet, if, as Prime Minister, responsible for our national safety, he has carefully inquired into our home land defensive means and organisation, and if he has satisfied himself, and so forth. Well, that is a question which I can well understand the noble Marquess not desiring to answer directly and by itself. It is a very direct and a pertinent question, but what was the answer of the noble Marquess? It was that, so far as the matter had come to his notice, he was of opinion that our resources were adequate. Now, I have the greatest respect for the noble Marquess, but I confess that that gives me no feeling of security whatever. He says, again, that we rely on our past history to give us a sense of security. Unhappy is the nation that relies for its security on its past history! Then the noble Marquess tells us he relies on the opinion of experts. If he will give us the opinion of experts we will rely on them too. My noble friend the Secretary of State for War has made innumerable statements in this House. He has led a most laborious life, both inside and outside this House; and I for one am the last to disparage his administration of the great Department over which he presides or the success which has attended his efforts. He has developed schemes for our national defence, but when he has been developing them I have been asking myself the question which I ask the noble Marquess, and which I ask your Lordships now—where are the experts? The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War cannot be an expert; it is part of our extraordinary policy never to put an expert at the head of our naval or military services; but he has an expert in that office, the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief. He is practised in oratory, he is fond of oratory. I do not think I am going too far in saying that, but on no one occasion has it been my good fortune to see the noble Lord the Commander-in-Chief present to give the weight of his assurance in support of the schemes suggested by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. I must say this, with all the deference that I feel for the two noble Marquesses and for my noble friend the President of the Council of National Defence, who, I fear, is no exception to the rule to which I have alluded—that we do not place experts at the head of our naval and military services—there has not been one single sentence from the noble Viscount the Commander-in-Chief assuring us that we were amply prepared for all contingencies in view of the known facts of the hostility of the people of Europe, of the drain on our Indian resources, of the drain on our home resources, and the increasing requirements which events in the Far East are likely to place on those resources. I should be more satisfied, my Lords, with one single sentence from the noble Viscount than with a thousand speeches to the Primrose League. My Lords, this is a very grave matter. We are about to separate for a prolonged recess. It will be the good fortune of your Lordships, whatever may happen in the Long Vacation, to reassemble in your full numbers, without damage to life or limb from any political occurrence, when Parliament reassembles next year. But there are probabilities, possibilities, I know not what to call them, of which I know that the Prime Minister knows nothing, because I heard him say so last night. But there are possibilities and probabilities which point to a great political convulsion in the course of the autumn, and which, of course, implies that the House of Commons, on adjourning for the holidays in August, will adjourn not to meet again. Is it too much to ask of the Government that before that event occurs we should be placed in possession of the opinions of those experts which are so reassuring to them and would be so reassuring to us? I would not limit the wish to what my noble friend, in his racy manner, calls the “dry bobs” of military defence. I should be very glad to hear the expert opinion of your “wet bob” chiefs—I do not mean Mr. Goschen, but the men in command of our fleets—the Mediterranean fleet, for example—to know if they are quite satisfied as to our preparedness for the dreadful issue of battle. God grant that it may not occur, but the facts to which the noble Marquess has called our attention, and to which others called our attention even before his Primrose League speech, are matters of public notoriety. Speeches, however eloquent, will not remove or get over them; and I venture to say that it is the opinion of the vast majority of the community of this country that a few reassuring words founded on expert knowledge with regard to our preparedness for the eventualities which may occur either this year or the next would be a profound consolation.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I do not know whether it is altogether becoming that I should intervene in this discussion. I call to mind an old saying which is, I think, of classic origin—that those who were fortunate enough to obtain the attention of Jupiter could afford to disregard altogether the minor divinities. The noble Earl has appealed to Jupiter, and has had his reply. I should not intervene but for what has been said by the noble Earl who has just sat down. The noble Earl said he was not contented with mere assurances from this Front Bench. He said, “Give us some facts.” Well, my Lords, I have on more than one occasion—

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I said expert opinion.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I will come to the experts in a moment. We were asked, in the first place, for the facts. I believe on more than one occasion I came down to the House and submitted to your Lordships statements of facts supplied by those very experts whose opinion the noble Earl wishes to obtain. Let me enumerate one or two of the facts of the case. We have at this moment in South Africa the largest military force this country has ever put into the field. We have been maintaining that force in point of numbers and equipment for some months past. I trust that hostilities may now be drawing to a close, but up to the present time we have been steadily pouring into South Africa the drafts of men and the supplies of horses and of materials required to keep that great army in the field. In spite of that, it is a fact that there are at this moment in the country under arms about 50,000 more men than we have barrack accommodation for in the United Kingdom. I cite that to your Lordships as some evidence that the country is not in that denuded state which the two noble Earls would have us suppose. Then we have raised emergency battalions.

The noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery) was not in the House the other night when I read textually the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief upon the efficiency and value of those battalions. Lord Wolseley spoke of them—I read his own words*—in the highest possible terms. Then there is in this country a great force of embodied Militia. With regard to the state of the Militia, I quoted to your Lordships not the opinion of War Office civilian officials, but the opinion of an expert, of the general officer whose business it is to inspect the embodied Militia. I also referred to the measures which have been taken to increase the efficiency of the Volunteer force, of whom, as your Lordships know, a very large number are going into special camps for special instruction altogether different from that which they have received in ordinary years. Again, with regard to these Volunteer battalions, I gave to your Lordships the verdict of the military expert whose business it is to inspect these battalions and to visit one camp after another during the training season. In addition to all that, we have for some time past been engaged upon the task of re-arming our defences. We are increasing our horse and field artillery, and we have made considerable progress in doing so, and we have, besides that, added to the permanent strength of the infantry. The noble Earl is not satisfied when I come to your Lordships from the War Office and tell you what I learn from my military advisers there. He says, "Why do you not bring down your Commander-in-Chief and put him up to deliver reassuring speeches in your Lordships' House?" I confess there is a view of that proposal which presents itself forcibly to my mind, and which, I suppose, has not occurred to the noble Earl. I think if you were to make it a sine qua non that the military officer whom you put in command of the forces of this country is to have assigned to him as part of his official duties the duty of coming down to Parliament and making speeches in defence of Government measures, you would be very apt to do what to my mind would be a very mistaken thing indeed—to turn your Commander-in-Chief into something like a political partisan. I trust I shall not live to see that practice introduced into your Lordships' House. The noble Earl who spoke first read us a long lecture upon the danger of depending entirely upon the protection of the Fleet. I do not think any one of my colleagues has ever adopted the extreme view that it is possible to secure the safety of these islands by reliance on the Fleet alone. We have, on the contrary, all of us, invariably admitted that it was necessary not only that we should have for our first line of defence a strong and thoroughly-equipped Fleet, but also, for home defence, a sufficient force to defend these shores from the attack of an invader at a moment when a large part of the naval forces of the Crown might be engaged at a distance. I cannot help asking your Lordships whether these infructuous criticisms really carry us very much further towards the attainment of that degree of security for which the two noble Earls sigh so much. When I have asked the noble Earl below the gangway (the Earl of Rosebery) what he had to propose, he has replied, "It is your business to tell us. It is not my business, so long as I am out of office." But I do think that when we have these perpetual attempts to belittle and ridicule everything which is done by Her Majesty's Government we have a right to ask the noble Earl that he should at least give us some indication as to the defects of what we ourselves propose, and some indication of the measures which, if he were called to power, he himself would adopt. On no occasion has the noble Earl ever come to that point. He repeats these turgid sentences, belittling and ridiculing what we have done, but he never gives us the slightest hint or indication of what he would do in a position of equal responsibility. The noble Earl does not very much differ in his practical proposals from the noble Earl who spoke first. The Earl of Wemyss has two practical proposals to make. One is, "Give me the Militia ballot." I have shown your Lordships again and again that if you had the Militia ballot to-morrow it would not give you that accession of strength which the noble Earl desires to obtain for the purpose of meeting the present emergency. The noble Earl knows perfectly well that it would not give him a trained man by the 1st November next—that magical date which he has insisted upon so much tonight. The other remedy of the noble Earl is a far simpler one. He proposes to hang somebody. When he made his last speech he was contented with hanging a single individual. I imagine I was the destined victim. But to-night he proposes to hang the whole of the Secretaries of State who have held office at the War Office since the Crimean War.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: No.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am sorry I cannot place myself at the disposal of the noble Earl for that purpose, but I do trust that when he next brings this subject before the House he will at least have some practical alternative to offer in place of the measures which we, after deliberation and careful consultation with our expert advisers, have laid before Parliament and the country.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I shall say very little, because most of the arguments which can be used have been already exhausted; but I should think myself wanting in my duty if I did not express the opinions which I hold upon the very serious matters which have been brought to the attention of your Lordships by the noble Earl the Earl of Rosebery. The noble Marquess who has just sat down twitted my noble friend with not having made adequate proposals to, I suppose, increase our military and naval power. He says he criticises and finds fault with the present Government, but he does not give a hint to show what might have been done better. That is a very old gibe against the Opposition, which has no effect whatever on my mind. It is not the business of the Opposition to propose measures. It is the business of the Government of the day to propose measures on its responsibility, and it is the duty of the Opposition, if they are not satisfied with those measures, to point that out, and, if need be, to take the opinion of Parliament and of the country upon them.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Hear, hear!

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am not going to place myself in a position of violent antagonism to noble Lords opposite. I recognise, in the first place, that the times are extremely critical. The occurrences in various parts of the world are such as may perplex the wisest statesmen, and although I by no means approve and commend everything which noble Lords opposite have done, I hope I have shown some consciousness that if I have any power at all I should not use it to weaken the Government in the conduct of affairs in times which are difficult and even dangerous in their character. I rather regretted the very strong expression in the speech of the noble Marquess to the Primrose League. I am not speaking now from an opinion formed at this moment, but I rather regretted it at the time. I thought the views he enunciated as to the hostility which existed in so many countries against us were sound and well founded, but I thought, if he will allow me to say so, considering the position he occupies—one that is not only very important as Prime Minister of the country, but even still more important from the long experience he has had of foreign affairs—I thought, if he will allow me to say so, that he somewhat exceeded what was desirable in the very strong opinion that he expressed on that occasion. Those who read and hear platform speeches are very apt indeed to not thoroughly comprehend the precise meaning attached to them by men experienced in the very difficult subject of foreign affairs, and I think that when they read the speech of the noble Marquess the greater mass of them did not appreciate—I certainly did myself—the distinction which he drew with regard to a danger which is accumulating and which may have very considerable effect as regards the necessity of strong military and naval defences in this country at a period not yet arrived. I do not think the ordinary public would discriminate, as no doubt they ought to have discriminated, between that and the expression of opinion, as they read it, that they were surrounded by a danger of an immediate and dangerous imminency. I thought the expression of that was somewhat unfortunate. I have myself always thought it was a very satisfactory thing that, so far, notwithstanding this hostile feeling, the Governments of the various countries have shown no unfriendly feeling towards us. I have always felt that that was a phenomenon which might make us seriously reflect that possibly, certainly not in my remembrance, never was there so unfriendly a feeling all over Europe

towards this country as there is now—a feeling the real foundation for which I have never been able to understand, but which makes it the more dangerous in my view, because an unreasoning hostility is just the one which is the most difficult to meet. But I think my noble friend Lord Rosebery was justified in what he said as regards the desirability of knowing what the expert opinion is; but I agree with the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, and differ from my noble friend, upon the point of whether we ought to have the Commander-in-Chief appearing in this House and undertaking duties which, in my opinion, can only be discharged by a responsible Minister. I should myself, like my noble friend, attach the highest importance, no doubt, to a speech made by the Commander-in-Chief, but our Parliamentary system is such that if you were to bring experts down to this House, and they were to usurp the position of the Minister, you would sap the very foundations upon which our whole political arrangements are based. If the Commander-in-Chief comes here and makes his statement, the First Naval Lord must come here and make his statement. I think it would be impossible for any Minister to undertake the conduct of either the Military or the Naval Department of the State if the experts were to be set up as the great authorities in Parliament. But whilst I say that, I limit it entirely to the point of the expert appearing here or in the House of Commons, and I do think the Government ought to carefully give us, on their own responsibility, the authentic statements they have received from their experts, so far as the interests of the public service permit of the public expression of such opinions. That course would not tend to weaken the Government. On the contrary, it would tend to strengthen the Government by strengthening the public confidence in the statement made by the Government, and the public would understand that, when the statement of a Minister was not accompanied by the expert's opinion, circumstances rendered it necessary that that opinion should not be published. I do not think that the laying of the experts' opinions before Parliament would have the effect of calming the public mind. There is no doubt that there is a feeling of uneasiness in the public mind; and no one can deny that there is cause for it. Look around upon the position of affairs. We have the flower of the British Army locked up in South Africa in a war that may drag on for some time, and upon the top of that great undertaking we have a state of affairs in China which seems to puzzle the wisest statesmanship of Europe and America. I do not think anyone would venture to foretell what will take place in China. It may be that the revolutionary movement will subside, and that we may obtain satisfaction from the Chinese Government for the terrible atrocities we have only too much reason to fear have been committed. It may be, on the other hand, that portions of that enormous country may fall into a state of disorganisation and disturbance which may, in the first place, endanger the life of every European and American who has the ill-fortune to be in that country, which may, in the second place, destroy the trade carried on with that country, and, in the third place, place the European and American Powers in a position of extreme difficulty; for if they have to destroy the Government of China they will have to substitute another in its place, and can you conceive a duty more difficult that could be laid on what is called the European Concert, or more likely to lead to most serious results? As my noble friend has said, we are about to separate for probably a considerable time, and we must earnestly hope that Her Majesty's Government will devote themselves to seeing that, in the opinion of those experts whom they consult and trust, everything is being done that can properly be expected to be done to place this country in a position of thorough safety, and to induce a feeling of public contentment.

POST OFFICE SITES BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (The Marquess of LONDONDERRY): My Lords, this Bill is, in principle, the same as those which have been submitted for the past twenty years, and which have always passed through your Lordships' House without opposition. Under this Bill, which has been considered in the House of Commons both by the Select Committee and by Committee of the whole House, the Post Office obtain powers to clear sites in London, Bristol, Ilford, Sheffield, and Southampton. The Postmaster General is empowered to erect buildings on the lands taken, but all persons interested will be entitled to compensation under the Lands Clauses Act. I may say, to remove some apprehension which has been felt, that there will be no alteration made in Post Office Court, between Lombard Street and King William Street. Certain provisions have been inserted for the protection of sewers and streets in London, and Mr. Hanbury stated in the House of Commons that these provisions would be extended so as to apply to all the local authorities in the districts where sites will be acquired. Up to now it invariably has been the custom that not more than ten houses shall be taken compulsorily. In Bristol there is a larger number of houses intended to be taken, but Mr. Hanbury has undertaken to provide for the rehousing of any of the labouring classes who may be dispossessed.

Moved, "That the Bill be read a second time."—(The Marquess of Londonderry.)

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed for Monday next.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

*EARL GREY said the object of the Amendment he rose to move was to restore a proviso which was deliberately inserted, after full consideration by both Houses of Parliament, in the Act of 1883, and which made it compulsory upon every valuer and referee appointed under that Act to have regard, in making the valuation of any agricultural improvement, to what was justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil. He understood that there was no difference whatever between the Parliament of 1883 and the Government which was responsible for the introduction of this Bill so far as the point of principle was concerned. He did not understand that any member of the Government denied that a valuer ought to take into account what was justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil. While in 1883 it was held to be absolutely necessary, as a precaution against possible confiscation and injustice, that every valuer should have regard to the inherent capabilities of the soil, and that he should be instructed by statute to have such regard, the Government now proposed that no statutory instructions should be given to the valuers, as they believed that every valuer would naturally have regard to what was justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil. That was a very unsatisfactory position to be in. He understood the proviso was dropped out of the present Bill on the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1887, who thought it was obnoxious to many and unnecessary, and that referees, in estimating the tenant's interest in the value of an improvement, would take into consideration the character of the soil, its natural fertility and capabilities, without any instruction by statute. Every fair valuer would do so, but legislation was introduced not to guide the conduct of fair men, but to make unfair men carry out their duty. He was apprehensive that there were valuers who would not act in the way suggested. The President of the Board of Agriculture, speaking in the House of Commons, repudiated the possibility of valuers considering the effect of agricultural operations without considering the capacity of the soil. But if it was right for a valuer to have regard to the inherent capabilities of the soil, why was that not stated honestly and straightforwardly in the Bill, so that all the world could understand it? How was it likely the valuers would construe their duties? They were hard-working, absolutely fearless and honest men, who would go to the statute, and the statute only, for their instructions. They would see that they were required to determine that as compensation such a sum should be given as fairly represented the value of the improvement to the incoming tenant. If his sense of justice suggested to a valuer that some deduction should be made in respect of the inherent capabilities of the soil, he would compare the Act of 1883 with that of 1900, and he would see that Parliament had thought it right to eliminate the instruction as to taking the inherent capabilities of the soil into account from the latter Act. The valuer would conclude that, however much he wished to, he was not entitled by his statutory instructions to have any regard for the inherent capabilities of the soil. This would injuriously affect the interests of landowners, and would cause grave injustice. In Northumberland there was an experimental farm managed by the county council, which had the great advantage of being directed and supervised by Professor Somerville. The result of the scientific teaching of this experimental farm showed that the application of half a ton of basic slag, which had cost the occupier 22s. per acre in the first three years, had given a live-weight increase per acre in the three years of 321 lb. of mutton, which, valued at 3½d. per lb., was equivalent to an increase in value of £5. This was obtained at a total cost of 22s. If the valuer in this case did not consider himself obliged to have regard to the inherent capabilities of the soil, injustice and confiscation would be the result. Did they not suppose that the newspapers which represented the views of the extreme advocates of tenant right would point out that this proviso had been deliberately struck out by Parliament in order that the tenant might get the full value of the improvements without any deduction being made? There was every reason to believe that pressure would be brought to bear on the valuers not to have regard to the inherent capabilities of the soil. Not one Minister had expressed himself in favour of the policy that the valuer should not have regard to the inherent capabilities of the soil. Why, therefore, eliminate this provision which was in the Act of 1883? If it tended to preclude valuers from taking into consideration the inherent capabilities of the soil, Parliament would be making itself responsible for a policy of confiscation and injustice, and would be putting upon the Statute-book a germ of great future trouble.

Moved—

"In page 1, line 12, to add the following proviso:—'Provided always, that in estimating the value of any improvement in Schedule I., there shall not be taken into account, as part of the improvement made by the tenant, what is justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil.'"—(Earl Grey.)

VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, I think it is necessary that your Lordships should know how these words were omitted when the Bill was drawn. This matter has been under the consideration of a great number of official bodies for some time past. The Central Chamber of Agriculture, as long ago as 1894, passed a resolution recommending the omission of this particular proviso from any Bill that was brought forward in the future. Then came the Royal Commission, which reported in 1898. The matter was discussed very fully before them, a considerable amount of evidence was taken, and they came to the unanimous conclusion that the proviso ought to be struck out. Although the Commission was formed of men of both parties, upon this particular question they were absolutely unanimous in their recommendation, and the proviso was struck out at the desire not only of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, but, I believe, of most of the chambers of agriculture throughout the country, backed up by the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission. Of course, your Lordships' action must be independent of what took place in the House of Commons; but it is worth while calling your attention to the fact that when this matter was discussed in the other House the majority in favour of leaving out the proviso, both in the Standing Committee and in the House itself, was of considerable dimensions. I do not think this ought to be argued as if the Bill in its present form would really take away from the landlord anything that he possesses or would be likely to get under a valuation, for Clause 1 of the Bill clearly states that—

"Where a tenant has made on his holding any improvement comprised in the First Schedule to this Act he shall, subject as in the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (in this Act referred to as the principal Act) and in this Act mentioned, be entitled, at the determination of a tenancy, on quitting his holding to obtain from the landlord as compensation under the said Acts for the improvement such sum as fairly represents the value of the improvement to an incoming tenant."

I do not suppose anyone would say that the inherent capabilities of the soil constituted an improvement made by the outgoing tenant. It is quite true that the words were inserted in the present Act; but if they are inoperative they are surplusage, and everything that is surplusage is bad. The "inherent capabilities of the soil" may mean anything or nothing. The proviso is spoken of in the evidence given before the Royal Commission as one which nobody could understand. I do not say it is so myself, because I thoroughly understand what it means; but evidence was given as to the difficulty of interpreting the words "inherent capabilities of the soil." I leave it, of course, to your Lordships to decide whether the proviso should be inserted or not. There is no intention on the part of the Government of altering the law with regard to this matter. The words I have read seem to be absolutely conclusive.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I am glad to hear from the noble Viscount that the Board of Agriculture merely consider these words as surplusage, and that that is the reason why it is proposed to omit them from the Bill. But let me put the matter the other way. Admitting that these words are surplusage, why not leave them where they are? On the other hand, if they are any more than surplusage, and if the Secretary to the Board of Agriculture is right in his opinion, then the difference which will be made in the law will be a very serious one indeed. It must be borne in mind that the opinion of the gentleman who wrote the text-book that has been referred to, or the opinion of Mr. Long, is really of no importance whatever. What is of importance is the opinion of the arbitrators who are to interpret this Act. They will be guided by this first section, which is drawn in the widest possible terms, providing that the value of the improvement is "the value of the improvement to the incoming tenant." There could be nothing wider than that, and there is no limitation. When they look back to the present law they will find that there was a limitation, and that limitation Parliament has struck out. They will say to themselves, "Surely Parliament was not so foolish as to strike out this limitation if that striking out was to have no meaning whatever." I should like in one sentence just to explain to your Lordships clearly what they would be doing if they were to adjudge what was due to the tenant having regard to the "inherent capabilities of the soil." It has been said that when a man hires a farm he hires the farm with the inherent capabilities of the soil. Perfectly true; but for how long does he hire it? For the time during which he is to hold it; and when his tenancy of the land ceases, his tenancy the "inherent capabilities of the land" ceases. But what the valuer would be this: the tenant has enjoyed during the whole of his tenancy all that was due to the inherent capabilities of the soil, the valuer by his decision would adjudge him what proceeded from the inherent capabilities of the soil—say—as in the case just mentioned years after the tenancy ceased, a period during which the tenant has no right in the soil, and therefore no right to be compensated for anything that accrues from it in this way a great injustice would be done against the owner of the soil to the favour of the tenant. I very strongly hope that your Lordships will retain the words which are at present in the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should be pardoned, perhaps, for saying a word on this question, because it happened to me on this question, because it happened to me. I was in office at the time the Act was passed. I have not had time to go into the matter, but I believe I am right in saying that in our original Bill these words do not occur; they were introduced by an Amendment in the House of Commons.

VISCOUNT CROSS: That is so.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I remember the discussion perfectly, and I paid a great deal of attention to it. I suppose I am duller of apprehension than other people, but for the life of me I cannot, and never could, understand what the effect of these words could be, or what possible object they could have. I have always thought that they are surplusage. They were assented to in order to avert possible opposition to the Bill which might have been done, but in the opinion—I know—of those with whom I acted, the words were of value whatever; and my opinion is that the sooner they go out of the Bill the better. There is only one point to which they can possibly be placed, and I do not see that that would benefit the landlord or the tenant—the unwary person may go to law to find out what they mean. I cannot conceive a prettier wrangle than would be in such a case, but I pity the man who has to pay the costs. Speaking now as a landlord, but as one keenly interested in the welfare of both land-tenant, I heartily concur in the view that these words should not be retained.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND : I would like to point out to the noble Earl opposite that the important point is, not whether these words are surplusage, or whether they are necessary, or, indeed, whether they are intelligible. They appear to be perfectly intelligible to the Lord Privy Seal, and we have no reason to think that they are not intelligible to the valuers. The argument the noble Earl has just used might be perfectly sound if the words had not been in the original Act; but it is a very different thing when you take words like these out of the Act and leave the valuers to draw their own inferences from the omission. I am not here to contest what the Lord Privy Seal has said with regard to the interpretation of Clause 1. I dare say Clause 1, as it stands, in effect does embody all that these words include, but I am not so certain that the valuers, who have understood this Act, who have so far had no difficulty in administering the Act, will be as clear in drawing inferences as the noble Lord's long experience enables him to be. I hope the words will be re-inserted, in order to leave no room for doubt as to what the intention of Parliament is.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE : I think the noble Viscount the Lord Privy Seal made it quite clear that Her Majesty's Government propose to leave it to the Committee to decide whether these words should remain or not. Personally, I am very much inclined to agree with the view taken by the noble Earl opposite, and although I quite admit that a great number of your Lordships are very well acquainted with these subjects and very competent to express an opinion upon them, still, I am not altogether inclined to ignore the authority of the unanimous opinion of the Royal Commission as well as that of the experts of the Board of Agriculture. It is stated in the Report of the Royal Commission that these words are unnecessary, and that they have given rise to misconception and misrepresentation on the part of some of the friends of the tenants; and I think it is probable that the Act would be improved if the words were omitted. However, as it is almost impossible to mistake what is the prevailing opinion upon this subject of the Committee as at present constituted, I scarcely think that it will be necessary to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, as opinion appears to be so entirely in the opposite direction. Personally, as I have said, I should prefer that the words should have gone out, because I believe that it is important in the interests not only of the tenant, but of the landlord, that the tenant should not only possess, but know and feel confident that he possesses, full security for compensation for any outlay which he may embark upon in the performance of what are real improvements; and the insertion in the Act of any words which he cannot understand and nobody can explain to him is calculated to impair that confidence, and, therefore, to make him less willing to undertake improvements, and less anxious to do the best by the land either in his own interest or that of the landlord. For these reasons I regret that the Committee should take a view opposed to that of the Royal Commission and the experts of the Board, but, as it is clear that the great majority of your Lordships do not share in that regret, the Government, at any rate, do not propose to divide upon the question.

On Question, "That those words be there inserted," their Lordships divided :—Contents, 50; Not-Contents, 5.

VISCOUNT CROSS: The Amendment I now move is submitted in pursuance of an undertaking given by Mr. Long in the House of Commons to introduce words which should prevent the possibility of an unreasonable and excessive quantity of manure being required to be returned to the holding in respect of crops allowed to be sold off during the concluding years of the tenancy. It was suggested that the clause, which is admittedly required in favour of the landlord, might be utilised in that way, and it was considered proper to provide this safeguard.

Amendment moved—

"In page 1, line 27, after 'endured' insert 'not exceeding the value of the manure which would have been produced by the consumption on the holding of the crops so sold off or removed.'"—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said this was a very peculiar Amendment, and its meaning was not very clear at first sight. Sub-section 4 as it stood provided that—

"In the ascertainment of the amount of the compensation payable to a tenant in respect of manures as defined by this Act, there shall be taken into account the value of the manure required by the contract of tenancy or by custom to be returned to the holding in respect of any crops sold off or removed from the holding within the last two years of the tenancy or other less time for which the tenancy has endured."

That was a very ordinary contract in the case of any farm near a town, and, apart from contract, was an arrangement imposed by custom. But if the words proposed by this Amendment were inserted it would be necessary to enter into two calculations—(1) how much crop had been sold off the land, and (2) how much manure that crop would have produced; and, if that amount of manure exceeded by one cow-pat the proper amount, the difference was to be taken into account in calculating the compensation. This interference with the arrangement come to under contract or existing by custom was quite unreasonable; it would be much better to cut out all reference to custom and contract altogether than to limit it in this absurd way.

On Question, "That those words be there inserted," agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2:—

Drafting Amendments made.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said that the object of the new sub-section he rose to move was very simple—namely, that the present practice with regard to notices of claim should be continued. It might be asked how it was that the provisions he now proposed, which were in the original Act, had come to be dropped out. It happened that the Bill omitted Sections 6 to 16 of the principal Act, and these provisions were contained in one of the sub-sections omitted. As the Bill stood, it would not be necessary for the tenant to give any details of any kind in making his claim, or for the landlord to give particulars of the deductions he claimed under Sub-section 3. It was surely for the general convenience that the old practice should continue of requiring detailed particulars to be given.

Amendment moved—

"In page 2, line 40, after 'claim' to insert a new sub-section: 'Every claim and written notice under this section shall state, as far as reasonably may be, the particulars and amount of the intended claim.'"—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

VISCOUNT CROSS explained that the unanimous opinion of the Royal Commission was that notices of claim should be done away with, it having been found that they were inconvenient, and led to trouble and expense. The noble Earl need not be afraid of particulars not being

, because, under the Bill as it stood, one unreasonably refused to give valuations he would be subject to costs at the discretion of the valuer.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 3, 4, and 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 :—

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND, in moving the rejection of this clause, said he would find it easier to give reasons for its rejection if he had heard reasons for its being in the Bill at this time. This legislation, their Lordships were aware, was an interference with the freedom of conduct; that was the avowed object; but in addition to that it was giving the tenant by a sidewind a great amount of fixity of tenure. As the good landlords were necessarily very anxious of doing anything which would enable the tenant to leave his holding, free of the trouble and expense involved; but why should the Legislature say with any protection which the landlord now had against any act of the tenant which might be detrimental to the landlord, without taking the extreme care of determining the tenancy? It was very questionable whether penal rents were really legal. The law as it stood gave ample protection to the tenant against anything unfair in the way of rents. Why should there be a still further limitation of the right of the landlord to prevent improper cropping or bad treatment of his land, when the law already went far enough in restricting the landlord's enjoyment of his property? If it was provided that this section should not apply to any covenant or condition against breaking up permanent pasture and other matters, but there were other matters besides those enumerated in the proviso which were properly the subject of penalties in case the tenant transgressed the terms of his lease.

Amendment proposed—to leave out Clause 6.”—(The Duke of Northumberland.)

SCOUT CROSS said that in a great number of cases provisions were included in the lease requiring the payment of penalties or liquidated damages for acts which were not all likely to result in an equivalent amount of loss to the landlord. These penal clauses were certainly not looked upon with favour by the courts, and there was often great difficulty in enforcing them. It was considered that a better feeling would be brought about between landlord and tenant if these penal clauses were done away with, except in those very special cases where the injury to the landlord might be a very serious matter.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND pointed out that at present the landlord had a legal and an equitable remedy; he might take his complaint against the tenant before a court of law or before an arbitrator. If it were true that the courts “did not look with favour” on these clauses, there was still less reason for depriving the landlord of his legal rights.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH expressed the opinion that these penal clauses were extremely disadvantageous in a lease, and, in his experience (not now a very short one), they were very rarely enforced. He believed the chief result of piling up clauses providing large damages for the landlord was only to produce irritation and ill-feeling, and in estates under enlightened management they were now being generally dropped. With the power of making a counter-claim provided for in this Bill, the landlord had ample opportunity of protecting himself. This clause would only put into general application the practice which was already adopted in the great majority of instances.

Amendment negatived.

Clauses 6, 7, 8, and 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 :—

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH moved the insertion of a new sub-section, proposed at the instance of the Scottish Office, and accepted by the noble Viscount in charge of the Bill, the object of which was to clear up a doubt that had been expressed as to the competency of an appeal in certain cases from the decision of a sheriff-substitute to a sheriff. In the cases with which this clause dealt, the sheriff-substitute was really acting instead of the sheriff, and clearly, if an appeal should lie at all, it should be not to the sheriff, but to a higher court. The sub-section he now moved would avoid any risk of additional and unnecessary legal procedure being introduced.

Amendment moved—

“In page 5, at end of clause to insert: ‘(5) Where any jurisdiction committed by the principal Act or this Act to the sheriff is exercised by the sheriff substitute there shall be no appeal to the sheriff.’”—(Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

First Schedule:—

LORD WINDSOR moved the first of three Amendments applying to items (4) (6) and (11) of Part I. of this schedule. This part enumerated among the improvements to which the consent of the landlord was required—

“(4) Making and planting of osier beds (exceeding one acre).”

“(6) Making of gardens (exceeding one acre).”

“(11) Planting of orchards or fruit-bushes (exceeding one acre).”

He proposed to omit the words “exceeding one acre” in each instance. As the Bill stood it was not quite clear whether the intentions that a tenant farmer should only be able to deal with one acre of land, and must choose which of the three objects he would devote that one acre to, or whether he was at liberty to devote three acres to these three special objects. As he read the Bill, he saw nothing in the way of the latter course. But, apart from the doubt as to the effect of the provision, he maintained that this was introducing a new and wholly indefensible principle. In the other House a similar Amendment to the present was proposed, and the Government had admitted that, logically, this portion of the schedule could not be defended; but the President of the Board of Agriculture said that farmers fully realised why the distinction of one acre should be drawn. On a large farm no great harm would be done by devoting one or even three acres to these purposes, but in the case of a small farm it might be a very serious matter indeed. Take the case of a twenty-acre farm, with several changes of tenancy within ten years; if each tenant exercised his rights under this schedule, that small farm might in the course of ten years become converted into a chess-board of osier beds and gardens and orchards. And the landlord was not only to be compelled to suffer this, but he was to be liable for compensation as well. There was also this possibility: the present Government thought it right to fix a limit of one acre, but another Government, holding very different views, might extend the principle and allow five or ten acres to be devoted to these purposes. This was no doubt the “thin end of the wedge” argument, and there was generally about that argument the weakness that it relied upon prophecy; but it happened that in the House of Commons, where a similar Amendment had been moved, and opposed by the Government, the wedge had been immediately driven home against them. After the President of the Board of Agriculture had defeated an Amendment similar to the present one, a Member for a Scottish constituency got up and moved that the tenant farmer should be permitted to redeem not exceeding one acre of waste land. The President of the Board of Agriculture was reduced to using exactly the same argument that had been used against him five minutes before in order to defend himself against this very severe hitting of the wedge which he himself had just inserted. That Amendment was defeated; but it was very difficult to see why, if a tenant farmer could use an acre for the making of an orchard or a garden, or planting an osier bed, he should not be allowed to reclaim an acre of waste land. He could not see how this provision could be defended, and he did not believe it was supported except by those who desired dual ownership of the land. He appealed to the Government to remove this blot from the Bill.

Amendment moved—

VISCOUNT CROSS said that, as he understood the effect of the schedule, only one acre would be liable to be applied to each of these objects. This proposal was embodied in the Report of the Central Chamber of Agriculture so long ago as 1894, and he and that present at the meeting of that body, and agreeing with that Report were Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Jeffreys, Mr. Clare Sewell Read, and others, and that the Committee consisted of members of both political parties. A proposal to give tenant farmers right to compensation in respect of orchards and trees, irrespective of size, was rejected by the Committee, and this limited provision was agreed upon, the object being to encourage small gardens and things of that kind. The proposal was again considered by the Royal Commission of 1893, the members of which were Lord Cobham, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Long, the late Mr. Little, and Sir John Gilmour, and they unanimously endorsed the proposal. With respect to the argument of the noble Lord who moved the Amendment, that in the course of ten years the whole holding might be turned into an orchard or an osier bed, the answer was that the only compensation the tenant could claim was the value of his improvement "to the incoming tenant." That would be in practice sufficient protection against a tenant applying any considerable part of his holding to purposes which would have no value to the tenant who would succeed him. There was no ulterior object whatever in inserting these three lines in this part of the Schedule, and he hoped their Lordships would retain them.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM contended that too much attention should not be paid to decisions arrived at by the Central Chamber of Agriculture or any other public bodies; the business of the Legislature was to do justice as between landlord and tenant. The question here was whether this change in the law was fair and just. He held that its immediate effect would be injurious. In the case of small farms

(of which there were many in the north of England) the power of devoting an acre of the holding to an orchard or an osier bed, or a garden, although it might be an immediate advantage to the tenant, would mean a serious injury to the farm; and with a succession of tenants thinking only of their immediate advantage, the farm might be diverted altogether from its original and proper purpose. He agreed that this was the "thin end of the wedge"—it was a step towards dual ownership. There had been in the sister isle warning sufficient of the danger of that principle. He cordially supported the Amendment.

LORD HENEAGE pointed out that, as the words stood in the Second Schedule, a tenant could plant "any number" of osier beds, fruit gardens, etc., on a farm, so long as none of them exceeded three-quarters of an acre, or were under an acre. So that it would not require successive tenants to plant a dozen orchards or a dozen osier beds on a farm.

VISCOUNT CROSS: But the consent of the landlord must be given to anything over an acre.

LORD HENEAGE: I beg my noble friend's pardon. Under the words of the Bill, as drafted, there is nothing to prevent the tenant, without applying to the landlord at all, planting a dozen osier beds, providing that none of them exceeds one acre. It may be a mistake in the drafting, but that is the effect of the words as they stand.

On Question, whether the words proposed to be left out shall stand part of the schedule, their Lordships divided:—Contents, 15; Not-Contents, 25.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS—ADVANCE OF THE ALLIES ON PEKING.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether there is any news from China.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr.

BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): No, Sir; we have no further news at the Foreign Office; but I may, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman, allude to one question which is on the Paper—namely, as to whether the advance on Peking has yet begun. The commanding officer has not yet been able to advance, but preparations seemed to be far advanced towards completion.

CHINESE EMBASSY IN LONDON.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state how long the Emperor of China is to be represented by a Minister in London, while Her Majesty is practically unrepresented in China owing to communications with her Minister being interrupted by the neglect of the Chinese Government to keep communications open.

*MR. BRODRICK: The present situation in China is difficult and complicated, and while our information is imperfect I cannot make any statement in reply to the inquiry of the hon. Member.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS INQUIRY.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the South African Hospitals Commission will be able to inquire into the insanitary conditions which led to the outbreak of enteric fever and the consequent overcrowding of the hospitals at Bloemfontein.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It will rest with the Commission themselves to determine the scope of their reference, but my own impression is that if the insanitary condition was due to the neglect of the Medical Department it would undoubtedly come under the cognisance of the Commission. If, on the other hand, it was due to military necessities—as, for instance, to the insanitary condition of the camp following on Paardeberg—I imagine it would not come under the survey of the Commission; but that is my own personal impression.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: Is it not difficult to come to a conclusion of that kind without some inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It rests with the Commission to interpret their own reference.

KOORNSPRUIT DISASTER.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Colonel Broadwood, who was in command of the column at Koornspruit, was informed that the infantry post at the waterworks had been removed by order from Lord Roberts's headquarters, and whether he has any official reports showing that the movements of Colonel Broadwood's column were determined by the belief that there was a fortified infantry post on which to fall back; and will he state who is the officer responsible for failure to communicate to Colonel Broadwood the fact that the infantry post was about to be removed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it would be desirable to debate in the House these details of military operations, still less by way of question and answer.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware, although he does not read the newspapers, that the name of the officer has been bruited about for months past? It is not fair to other officers.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

RESUMPTION OF INDUSTRIAL OCCUPATIONS AT JOHANNESBURG.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the prohibition by Lord Roberts and Sir Alfred Milner against the return to Johannesburg is intended to apply to every person without exception; and, in particular, does it apply to such as engineers and owners of industrial works in Johannesburg, which during the war have had to be left in charge of Boers, or shut down, and the re-opening of which would be for the advantage of the military and community there and the re-settlement of the country, such as, for example, the steam laundry at Johannesburg, which belongs to two Englishmen, who wish to proceed thither, and is at present in custody of a Boer woman, and other similar cases.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The resumption of trade and industry will not be delayed a moment longer than the military exigencies require, and such persons as managers and engineers will be naturally allowed to go up in anticipation of the general population to make arrangements for re-establishing the industries of the place. But I learn on 6th July that up to that date Lord Roberts had only been able to allow the return of twenty mining representatives, and that these were still detained en route.

MARTIAL LAW IN CAPE COLONY AND RHODESIA.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state in what districts or areas of British South Africa is martial law now in force, and upon what dates was it so proclaimed in these districts or areas.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have to refer to my answer on the 2nd April to the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottinghamshire, and of yesterday to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire.* I have only to add that on 15th May martial law was proclaimed to be in force throughout all the districts of Southern Rhodesia.

LINDLEY DISASTER.

MR. KIMBER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state when and where the inquiry, which it is understood the Queen's Regulations require to be held in cases of capture or surrender of British troops, will probably be held in the case of the 13th Imperial Yeomanry at Lindley.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): No inquiry can be held until the prisoners are released.

BRITISH CASUALTIES IN JUNE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what has been the loss by casualties, sickness, and the capture and surrender of British forces in South Africa during the month of June, after the announcement that the war was practically over.

* See The Parliamentary Debates (Fourth Series), Vol. lxxx., page 934; and the present volume, page 1301.

MR. WYNDHAM: I know nothing of the announcement referred to at the end of the question. The total losses, including all deaths in South Africa, and men missing and taken prisoners, during the month of June, amount approximately to 102 officers and 2,714 men.

BRITISH MEDICAL COMFORTS FOR THE BOERS—TREATMENT OF BRITISH PRISONERS.

MR. KIMBER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has any information to the effect that the Boers while still in arms and actual fight with British troops were allowed to send in to Ficksburg for medical comforts, and that these were supplied from British Army stores, whilst British prisoners of war at Nooitgedacht have not been allowed to receive either medical comforts, clothing, or even to receive and transmit letters to their relatives; and whether he has yet succeeded in procuring any alleviation of these conditions.

MR. WYNDHAM: In regard to the medical assistance to the enemy at Ficksburg no report has reached the War Office. In regard to the British prisoners of war at Nooitgedacht the Government is making every effort to secure that supplies of medical comforts and clothing and correspondence shall reach them, and is most anxious to co-operate with any private effort in this direction. It is considered that private effort is likely to prove more efficacious. It must be remembered that there are difficulties at the present time in the way of communicating with the Boer Government. A telegram was, however, despatched to Lord Roberts on the 24th instant urging him to bring pressure to bear on the Boer authorities in regard to the treatment of the prisoners.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—CIVIL SURGEONS—SUPPOSED PLEDGE OF SECRECY.

DR. TANNER (Cork County, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if Lord Roberts has been asked by the War Office whether civil surgeons employed in South Africa have been required to sign a contract in which they undertook not to divulge in any way their opinions on hospital efficiency or the reverse; and, if so, can he say when did the War Office ask this question of Lord Roberts, and whether by post or telegraph, and when may an answer be expected.

MR. WYNDHAM: As I stated yesterday to the House, Lord Roberts has been asked this question by telegraph, but no reply has as yet been received.

DR. TANNER: When do you expect one?

[No answer was given.]

RETIRED ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS RECALLED TO ACTIVE SERVICE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state why the medical officers liable to recall were not ordered to rejoin instead of being asked individually to volunteer for duty in the military hospitals in South Africa, and if the War Office will take steps to bring the matter under the consideration of the Commission.

MR. WYNDHAM: As I stated on the 13th instant, in reply to a question by the Member for South Donegal, there are ninety-eight officers liable to recall; of these eighteen hold permanent appointments under the War Office and twenty-five have been employed during the war. The reason why the remainder were not called up is that it was thought better to employ civilian surgeons who have more recent experience.

COMMAND OF THE ROYAL IRISH RIFLES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a gentleman from another regiment has been appointed to the command in the Royal Irish Rifles rendered vacant by the death of Colonel Eager, who died from wounds in the Natal campaign; and what explanation, if any, has the War Office to offer for the passing over of the officers of the Royal Irish Rifles who fought in that campaign.

MR. WYNDHAM: The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. As regards the second paragraph I have on a previous occasion endeavoured to make clear to the hon. Member that the selection of such commanding officers is made by the Commander-in-Chief and the Army Board.

BRITISH REVERSES—COURTS OF INQUIRY.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state how many officers and men were captured or surrendered at Nicholson's Nek, Koorn Spruit, Reddersburg, Lindley, Roodeval, and between Roodeval and Heilbron, and how many have been released from captivity; have the courts of inquiry prescribed by the Queen's Regulations to be held by the general officer commanding to investigate the circumstances under which the capture or surrender took place been held in the case of any other officers or men who were captured or surrendered on any of these occasions; and, if so, in what instances; and have the opinions of the court as to the circumstances under which those captures or surrenders have taken place been, in accordance with the Queen's Regulations, forwarded to the War Office; and, if so, on what grounds have they been withheld from the public.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member will find all the information which can be given in reply to the first paragraph in the published weekly report of the casualties. In reply to the remainder of the question, no detailed information as to the courts of inquiry has reached the War Office.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Have those inquiries been held or not?

MR. WYNDHAM: I cannot say that as a matter of fact, because I have not received the report.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Does the hon. Gentleman not know that the officers who have been imprisoned and released are now on active service, and is it possible without inquiry for them to be replaced on active service?

MR. WYNDHAM: In the absence of a report I cannot reply on the question of fact. I think it would be wasting the time of the House to indulge in speculative surmises.

IMPERIAL YEOMANRY ENCAMPMENT NEAR BEIRA.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the Secretary of State has received a report of the encampment of two Imperial Yeomanry battalions for three weeks in an unhealthy spot near Beira after their disembarkation, whereby widespread fever and dysentery were contracted, and many deaths occurred; whether, with one exception, all the officers were prostrated, and a number of horses died; and whether the Commission will inquire into the circumstances.

MR. WYNDHAM: A report of the detention of Yeomanry at Bamboo Creek and of mortality amongst the animals reached the War Office in May. A telegram was despatched to Sir F. Carrington calling for a full report. This has not yet been received.

GRATUITIES TO VOLUNTEER OFFICERS SERVING IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, according to the Queen's Regulations, all Militia officers whose regiments have been embodied, and who serve in the war in South Africa, will receive £100 apiece at the termination of the war; and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to give a gratuity of £100 to those Volunteer officers who have served in South Africa when peace is concluded.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. The gratuities are issuable to both Militia and Volunteer officers under the Pay Warrant.

VOLUNTEERS—EMPLOYMENT ON FOREIGN SERVICE.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if, without dividing the Volunteer force in time of peace into two classes, namely, those willing to serve in any part of the world if called upon and those willing to serve only in Great Britain, power can be taken in the Volunteers Bill to enable the services of Volunteers to be accepted for service in any portion of the world whenever Her Majesty's military or naval forces are engaged in actual operations of war.

MR. WYNDHAM: I fear it will not be possible to re-open this subject in connection with the Volunteers Bill, which has passed through Committee.

GIBRALTAR GARRISON—OFFICERS' HOUSES.

MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any steps have been taken, and, if so, what, to provide houses at reasonable rents for officers of the garrison at Gibraltar.

MR. WYNDHAM: The question has been under the consideration of a Committee which went to Gibraltar and has reported in favour of some such provision. The further questions of construction and of the rent chargeable are now under consideration.

ARMY PROMOTION BOARD.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state who are the members of the Army Promotion Board; by whom are they appointed to seats on this Board; what is the tenure of their office, and do they hold office at the pleasure of the Secretary of State for War, or of the Commander-in-Chief, or either of them; what are the duties of this Board; and when recommendations are made of gentlemen from other regiments to assume the commands held by men who have fallen in active service or become incapacitated from wounds, is a memorandum of the reasons for passing over the officers of the regiments in which such vacancies have occurred prepared in the War Office.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Promotion Board consists of the generals commanding in Ireland, at Aldershot, and either at Portsmouth or Devonport. These officers sit during the term of their appointment to their districts. Other officers, appointed by the Commander-in-Chief, are added to their number to deal with the particular arms of the service. A record is kept of the Board's recommendations.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: The hon. Gentleman has not told me the names of the members of this Board of Patronage.

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not think any useful purpose would be served by giving the names of the officers.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: That is a matter for the country, and not for you.

GUN FATALITY AT CAMDEN FORT, CORK.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, in reference to the inquest upon the body of Gunner John Addis, killed at Camden Fort, Cork, by the bursting of the breech of a 40-pounder gun on the 15th instant, whether he is aware that Captain Ord, Gunnery Inspector, stated at the inquest that an accident occurred about five years ago and the breech was blown away; and that the Record-book of the Ordnance authorities shows that the gun in question was examined in 1899 and reported as having a fissure in the vent; and can he state whether an Artillery Militiaman engaged upon artillery practice is in the same position as regards War Office regulations as an artilleryman of the Regular forces engaged on active service, and will the War Office authorities give any compensation to the relatives of the deceased if it should be proved that his death was occasioned by a defect in the gun.

MR. WYNDHAM: I informed the hon. Member yesterday that a report was expected upon this subject. When that report has been received and considered, I shall be ready to enter upon the questions he raises.

MR. FLYNN: If the inquiry is shown to be due to the fault of the War Office, would that not place the case on a different footing?

MR. WYNDHAM: That does not enter into the question. If the injury is incurred in the service, it does not matter whether it is the fault of the War Office or not.

MILITIA OFFICERS' PAY.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether officers on retired pay holding commissions in Militia will be allowed to draw retired pay as well as the pay of their rank in Militia during embodiment.

MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir; except for a period equivalent to the period of annual training.

GREAT YARMOUTH FISHERMEN AND THE MILITIA.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that difficulties are anticipated at Great Yarmouth and elsewhere during the coming fishery season owing to many fishermen and employees in the fish-curing business being out for service with the Militia, and whether, where possible, furlough will be granted to such men during the fishery season so as to mitigate as far as possible injury to the fishing industry.

MR. WYNDHAM: As I have already explained to the House, instructions have been issued to the districts that Militiamen belonging to units embodied prior to March might be given furlough if they had satisfactorily completed their training and could be spared.

*SIR J. COLOMB: Will that apply to all men?

MR. WYNDHAM: To all men of good character.

MILITIA SERGEANT-MAJORS.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state when sergeant-majors of Militia battalions are to receive warrant rank; and whether a colour sergeant and two sergeants are to be attached to each company as permanent staff.

MR. WYNDHAM: The warrant was signed on the 26th July. The reply to the second part of the question is in the negative.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS — IRISH TENDERERS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether it is the intention of the Government to provide a depôt in Dublin for the accommodation of Irish merchants and manufacturers who are desirous to tender for supplies and fulfil contracts for Ireland.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): No, Sir; the small advantages which might be derived from the establishment of a depôt in Dublin would in no way compensate for the expenditure which it would necessarily involve.

THE "VICTORIA AND ALBERT."

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state how many tons of silicate cotton were used in packing the bulkheads and casings of the new Royal yacht "Victoria and Albert"; has this padding been removed; if so, what substitute is to be employed for the purpose of keeping the vessel cool; will he state how many tons of brass there were in the saloon and cabin sidelights, and whether all or part of these fittings have been removed; and will he also say when all the additional cast-iron ballast which is being fitted will be completed, and the number of tons.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Forty-nine tons of silicate cotton have been removed from the Royal yacht. The portion of this that was between the bulkheads and overhead was introduced not for the purpose of keeping the vessel cool, but with the idea of deadening sound. Experiments were carried out during the passage round from Pembroke to ascertain whether the silicate cotton on funnel casings and over the engine room was really required for the purpose of keeping the ship cool, and where it could be dispensed with. Either silicate cotton or mica lagging has been retained wherever it was found to be necessary for this purpose, and its removal in other places has enabled the ventilation of the lower deck to be improved. Great care has been taken not to interfere with the comfort of the ship in the slightest degree. Wooden shutters have been substituted for the brass shutters that were fitted to the windows of the pavilion, causing a saving of weight of about five tons, but none of the brass cabin side-lights have been removed. The exact quantity of ballast required cannot be stated until the ship has been inclined, which will be done shortly. It will probably not be more than 150 tons. A large portion of this is already in place.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Does the right hon. Gentleman expect that when these alterations are completed the vessel will be able to stand up in the water?

THE BELLEVILLE BOILER INQUIRY.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty will the terms of reference to the proposed Committee on Belleville Boilers enable the Committee to investigate the circumstances under which these boilers were first adopted by the Admiralty; to ascertain under whose advice they were thus adopted; and to examine the persons who gave that advice in such a manner as will enable those persons to explain the grounds on which the advice was given.

MR. GOSCHEN: If my hon. friend will recall what I said with reference to the proposed constitution of the Committee and the object of the inquiry, he will see that such an investigation as he suggests in his question was not contemplated.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS IN THE NAVY.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): On behalf of my hon. friend, the Member for East Clare, I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state what steps have been taken to furnish the Navy with Roman Catholic chaplains.

MR. GOSCHEN: There are certain proposals from Cardinal Vaughan under consideration. In other respects I must refer the hon. Member to many previous statements on the subject.

TORPEDO BOATS AT THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will be good enough to state the age, speed, and length of coal endurance at sea of the twenty-four torpedo boats which, in the current naval manœuvres, are being pitted against twenty-four modern torpedo boat destroyers, and whether the torpedo boats located in the French Channel ports are not only nearly double in number to those located in British Channel ports, but also more modern and of greater speed; and will he state whether the manœuvring squadrons are being replenished with fuel at sea or by returning to port, and whether they are accompanied by repairing and condensing ships; and, if not, can he state the reason, seeing that both descriptions would be needed in war.

MR. GOSCHEN: The question of the hon. Member comprises matters of statistics and naval policy, with which it is impossible to deal within the limits of a question. The hon. Gentleman will find statistics as to British and foreign torpedo boats in the Return of fleets presented to the House last year. The contending admirals have colliers at their disposal for coaling their squadrons when and where they wish. A condensing ship has been attached to each of A and B fleets for the manoeuvres. Except the "Hecla," which ship is capable of effecting small repairs, no repairing ships are taking part in the manoeuvres. The provision of such ships for the short period of the manoeuvres was unnecessary, and their fitting would have been very costly. I may remind the hon. Gentleman that provision was made in the additional Estimates for a repairing ship for general service with the fleet, but the arrangements have not yet been concluded.

NATIONAL COAL RESERVE.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the rise in the price of coal and the difficulties it will entail if long maintained upon many British industries, as also the suffering it will cause to the poor in winter; whether he has any official information to show that this result has been brought about by the increase in the purchases of coal by foreign competition, or by the laying in of stocks by foreign navies; and whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter in the interests of the home population, and of the defensive requirements of the United Kingdom.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): The price of coal exported in the first half of 1900 is considerably higher than in the year 1899, but not so high as in 1873, the figures being 15·87s. in 1900, 10·71s. in 1899, and 20·90s. in 1873. It is not practicable to apportion the recent rise in price among the various causes which have contributed thereto. With regard to the last question, the Government, while alive to the considerations referred to by my hon. friend, are not prepared at present to make any proposals to Parliament in the direction indicated by my hon. and gallant friend.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Will the right hon. Gentleman state to what countries the coal exported mainly goes?

MR. RITCHIE: I shall be glad to inform my hon. and gallant friend if he will put down a question on the subject.

IMPORTATION OF DOGS INTO GREAT BRITAIN.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has considered the inconvenience caused by the present stringent regulations as to the bringing back into the United Kingdom of dogs temporarily removed abroad by their owners; whether he is aware that some of these persons are invalids who dislike being separated from their dogs, and in some cases have been prevented from going abroad for their health by the anxiety and annoyance of the regulations, and because they are unwilling to be parted from pets; whether he is aware that, in some cases, persons who have brought dogs back are unable to comply with the regulation that the dogs should be kept in the same house for six months, owing to having let their own houses or to inability to remain in the same place; and whether, seeing that some of these persons have been subjected to prosecution and conviction for failing to comply with the regulations from causes thus beyond their control, and having regard to the anxiety and loss of time and money thus caused, he will substitute, in the case of dogs who have been taken by their owners from this country and are being brought back from abroad, simple regulations requiring notice to be given of changes of residence and periodical inspection by official veterinary surgeons, with any necessary penalties for evasion.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): My right hon. friend desires me to say that the question of the admission into Great Britain of dogs brought from abroad has been very fully considered from the various points of view to which the hon. Member refers. My right hon. friend does not consider that in practice the adoption of the suggestion made in the question would be found to afford the necessary measure of security against the reintroduction of rabies, but the practice of the Department with regard to the issue of licences has recently been somewhat modified, and perhaps the hon. Member will submit to my right hon. friend for further consideration particulars of any individual cases which may have been brought under his notice and in which he thinks that any cause for complaint exists.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—VENTILATION OF COMMITTEE ROOMS.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will consider during the recess whether some better system of ventilation for the Committee rooms of the House can be devised, so as to prevent the oppression caused, not only during periods of great heat, but also when the weather does not allow of the opening of the windows.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS: I beg to refer my right hon. friend to the reply I gave yesterday to questions on this subject.

KENSINGTON GARDENS REGULATIONS.

EARL PERCY (Kensington, S.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that Kensington Gardens, although opened to the public at 5 a.m. throughout the year, are closed even on the longest day at 9 p.m.; whether he is aware that many of the residents in the district can only use the gardens shortly before the hour at which they are now closed, and that inconvenience is caused to persons on their way between Kensington and Bayswater after dark owing to the necessity of making a wide detour; and whether, in view of the fact that neither the Green Park nor St. James's Park are closed at nightfall, he will consider the expediency of allowing the public to make use of Kensington Gardens, at least during the summer, up to 10 p.m.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS: Yes, Sir; I am aware of the facts stated in the first two paragraphs of my noble friend's question, but I would point out that the enclosure in St. James's Park is now shut at 8.30 p.m., and that in the Green Park which is open till 10 p.m. is lighted to a great extent. If Kensington Gardens were kept open after dark it would be necessary to make provision for lighting and policing, and I regret I do not see my way to do this, nor do I think it would be desirable to do so. In the absence of police and lighting it would be a great mistake.

HOVE RECREATION GROUND.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER (Sussex, Lewes): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has sanctioned the raising of a loan of £15,000 by the Corporation of Hove for the purposes of a recreation ground outside the limits of the borough. Whether he is aware that the sum to be borrowed represents only a small portion of what will probably be ultimately required, and that a petition signed by a body of working men residing in the parish of Aldington was presented in opposition to the scheme; and whether, in these circumstances, he will take any steps to prevent so large an expenditure of ratepayers' money on this project.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): The reply to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. It is the case that further expenditure will be required in connection with the proposal of the corporation. The Local Government Board received petitions in opposition to the scheme, and they caused two local inquiries to be held on the subject. After full consideration they came to the conclusion not to withhold their sanction to the loan, and the matter cannot now be reopened.

LOCAL TAXATION RETURNS.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Local Taxation Returns, presented on 28th May, will be delivered to Members; what has been the cause of the delay in printing and circulating these Returns; and whether he will take steps to place them in the hands of Members within the next few days.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The portion of the Local Taxation Returns to which the Hon. Member refers was presented to the House in dummy, and considerable revision has since been found necessary. This has now been effected, and instructions will be given that the copies shall be delivered to Members as early as practicable.

NEW SCIENCE AND ART REGULATIONS.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton): On behalf of the hon. Member for West Nottingham, I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether an opportunity will be afforded for the discussion of the new regulations and alterations made in the Science and Art Directory during the session; and, if not, will the new regulations and alterations be suspended from operation until they shall have received the consideration of Parliament.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): Yes; the Second Reading of the Appropriation Bill will afford such an opportunity.

MR. HARWOOD: On behalf of the hon. Member for West Nottingham, I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education by what authority the regulations contained in the Science and Art Directory became lawful and operative without being laid upon the Table or being subject to discussion by this House.

SIR J. GORST: The Directory is always laid on the Table of both Houses, though there is no statutory obligation requiring this to be done.

MR. HARWOOD: On behalf of the hon. Member for West Nottingham, I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education if he will grant a Return of any correspondence from inspectors of schools or other persons containing recommendations or suggestions which have led to changes in the regulations issued in the Science and Art Directory whereby science and art grants are to be withheld from school boards except under novel and difficult conditions.

SIR J. GORST: There is no such correspondence, and there is no intention to withhold from school boards such grants as have been heretofore made to them by the Science and Art Department.

MR. HARWOOD: On behalf of the hon. Member for West Nottingham, I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the new regulations in the Science and Art Directory will debar school boards from receiving science and art grants in respect of pupil teacher schools or central classes for pupil teachers.

SIR J. GORST: The answer is in the negative.

MR. J. A. PEASE: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Board of Education have so altered Clause 6 of the Science and Art Directory (1900) as to prevent school board classes, which are entirely dependent for local assistance upon the school fund, from participating in the grants administered by the Department of Science and Art.

SIR J. GORST: No such alteration has been made in Clause 6 of the Directory. The meaning of that clause is the same as it has been for many years, the words added being for the purpose of preventing a misinterpretation pointed out as possible by the school boards. But the Department has always held that the application of the school fund to science and art instruction, except in the case of pupil teachers, was illegal.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD — HIGHER ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the London School Board have applied for recognition of certain higher elementary schools with a modern curriculum not scientific in a preponderating degree, such as was recommended officially to the London School Board by reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors forwarded by the Board of Education; whether he is aware that as the result of a conference attended by Her Majesty's Chief Inspectors the London School Board adopted the recommendation as to curriculum; whether the Board of Education recommends schools with a prevailing modern and general education as equally suitable as, and in some towns and districts more suitable than schools of the type of the schools of science; and whether there is anything in the Minute limiting the recognition of higher elementary schools to schools whose curriculum bears a close resemblance to the curriculum of a school of science; and whether the Board of Education will leave local managers free to consult the needs of their localities in framing curricula for acceptance in higher elementary schools.

SIR J. GORST: The London School Board have applied for the recognition as higher elementary schools of seventy schools with a curriculum not scientific in a preponderating degree. The reports of Her Majesty's inspectors have, no doubt, expressed the view that a curriculum preparing scholars for the subsequent study of commercial subjects is suitable to public elementary schools in London. I am not aware of the grounds which induced the London School Board to adopt such a curriculum in the seventy schools above mentioned. The answer to the third paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. The scale of grants in the higher elementary schools minute is framed for schools whose curriculum bears a close resemblance to the curriculum of a school of science. It would be much too high for schools of the type described in the earlier paragraphs of the question. The Board of Education desire to leave to managers the greatest possible discretion in framing the curricula for their school; but they cannot pay the high grants of the higher elementary schools minute except to schools whose curriculum bears a close resemblance to the curriculum of a school of science.

MR. LOUGH: To how many of these seventy schools is the Board of Education prepared to pay the higher grants asked for by the London School Board?

SIR J. GORST: Not one; because the curriculum is of a commercial and not a scientific nature.

FOOD PRESERVATIVES.

MR. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General whether, as a Departmental Committee is now scientifically investigating the question of adding preservatives to food, and will report by the end of the year, he will send an intimation to all judicial authorities before whom any cases of adding preservatives to Devonshire cream may be brought, that it would be expedient to adjourn the proceedings until after the Departmental Committee has given its decision.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): I have no authority to interfere with the discretion of judicial authorities in the way suggested in the question, and it would be most improper for me to attempt to do so.

RURAL POSTMEN'S SHELTERS.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if the Department can see its way to relieve rural postmen of the responsibility of finding sites for shelters for their use at the outward end of their journey.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The present arrangement under which postmen obtain the necessary permission for placing shelters at the end of their walks is found to be convenient and to work without any practical difficulty; and the Postmaster General sees no reason for changing it. The shelters have sometimes to be moved from one point to another; and a formal tenancy of the site by the Postmaster General would in many cases create difficulties.

POSTMEN'S UNIFORMS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will state what is the relative weight of postmen's winter and summer uniforms.

MR. HANBURY: The weights of postmen's winter and summer uniform, including the shako, but excluding great-coat and waterproof cape, are as follows:—London: Winter uniform, 8 lb. 6 oz.; summer uniform, 5 lb. 6½ oz. Provincial: Winter uniform, 6 lb. 8 oz.; summer uniform, 5 lb. 7 oz. Great-coat: London, 5 lb. 11 oz.; provinces, 4 lb. 6 oz. Cape (waterproof), 2 lb. 12 oz.

TRADE MARKS—"FOREIGN ORIGIN."

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if the Law Advisers of the Crown have given their opinion as to the requirement by

The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, of a definite indication of foreign origin on any imported decorated tin box intended to pass into the permanent use of the consumer, if it bears the name of an English firm or English wording or marks, raising the presumption that the box was made by British labour.

MR. HANBURY: The question, which has necessitated correspondence between several Departments, is found to be one of some complication. But a case is being prepared and will shortly be submitted to the Law officers.

CIVIL SERVICE ABSTRACTORS - TERMS OF SERVICE.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any intimation was given to the registered men copyists promoted abstractors, under the conditions stated in the notice from the Civil Service Commissioners, dated 7th April, 1894, that they would be deprived compulsorily of the right, assured to them by the Treasury, of serving until they reached a maximum salary of £150 per annum, through an Order in Council carrying retrospective penal effects to come into force on 30th November, 1899; and, if not so intimated, can he state under what authority the Secretary of State for War claims to act in the case of two abstractors in the War Office, one of whom has made timely protest against being required to accept the terms of such retrospective penal enactment.

MR. HANBURY: The Treasury gave no assurance that the abstractors in question should serve until they reached a maximum salary of £150 per annum. As they were allowed to enter the class of abstractors up to the age of sixty, some of them might have claimed under such an assurance to remain till they were eighty or ninety years of age. I explained to the hon. Baronet on the 5th instant that the Order gives full authority to the Secretary of State to call upon abstractors to retire at sixty.

COUNTY COURT FEES.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General whether the Committee on County Court Fees has reported, and whether the nature of the Report will be made known to the House.

MR. HANBURY: The Committee have reported, and the substance of their recommendations has already been adopted in a Draft Order, which will shortly be made public under the Rules Publication Act.

IRISH LUNATIC ASYLUMS BOARD— SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has considered the arguments for an increased grant in excess of the Supplemental Estimate put forward on behalf of the Irish Lunatic Asylum Boards by the Most Rev. Dr. Kelly and others, and whether an opportunity for discussing the Supplementary Estimate will be afforded.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have considered the arguments put before me in this matter. I understand that it was suggested that some payment in excess of the Supplementary Estimate should be made for the first financial year of the new system, because the licences taken out in the previous year covered part of that year, and the payments for licences during that year were in many cases not made until a considerable part of it had expired. But this view was based on a misconception of the fifty-eighth section of the Act of 1898, which provided, not that the sum paid for licences in the first financial year of the new system should be paid to the Local Taxation Account, but that a sum equal to the amount collected for such licences in the previous financial year should be so paid—and this payment will be made to the Local Taxation Account early in the financial year, certainly not later than May. I do not, therefore, consider that there is any ground for the request for an increased grant. I will convey to the Leader of the House the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman that some opportunity should be afforded for discussing the Supplementary Estimate. But I can make no statement on that matter myself.

DERRY MAGISTRACY.

MR. ARTHUR J. MOORE (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state how many Protestant and how many Roman Catholic magistrates there in Derry city; and whether the Irish Government are prepared to take all reasonable steps to redress any inequality, and afford a due representation on the bench to the majority of the inhabitants of the city.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The number of magistrates in the city of Londonderry is forty-eight, of whom eighteen are Presbyterians, seven Roman Catholics, eight Protestant Episcopalians, four are Methodists, and one is a Baptist. I am not prepared to admit that the religion of the majority of the inhabitants should be the determining factor in the appointment of magistrates, but if the hon. Member desires to submit to the Lord Lieutenant the names of any eligible candidates for the position his suggestions would, of course, receive consideration.

GRANTS-IN-AID TO IRISH ASYLUMS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the amount due by the Treasury to the Irish Local Taxation Fund in respect of the grant-in-aid for Irish asylums, and how this figure was arrived at; and if he will also state how the money refunded will be allocated; and whether a proportionate amount, and, if so, how much to each, will be paid to the county councils of the various counties towards the upkeep of their respective asylums.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The amount due to the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account in respect of the grant-in-aid for pauper lunatics, and the manner in which the amount was arrived at will be found described in the Supplementary Estimate. The money, when voted, will be paid into the Local Taxation Account and will be available for the purposes mentioned in Section 58 of the Local Government Act of 1898.

GRANTS FOR MALICIOUS INJURIES IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he would consider the advisability of presenting annually to Parliament, or including in the judicial statistics particulars by counties and boroughs of the grants for malicious injuries in Ireland, showing the amount and nature of the claim, the number of dismisses, and generally the result of traverse or appeal; and could he state the amount levied for injuries for the first year under the Local Government Act, as compared with the last year under the grand jury system.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Detailed information on the points mentioned in the first paragraph will be included in future annual reports on judicial statistics in Ireland. It will take some days to collect the information desired in the second paragraph. It has been called for, however, and, when received, will be forwarded to the hon. Member.

CORK LAND COMMISSION.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state when it is proposed to hold the next Land Commission Courts in Macroom and Millstreet respectively, when were the last courts held, and how many cases remained unheard.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: A sub-commission last sat in Millstreet in October, and for the disposal of cases from Macroom in February. Forty-one cases from Millstreet and sixty-eight from Macroom district have not yet been listed for hearing. It is not, at present, possible to say when the next sitting of a sub-commission will be held in either of these districts.

MUZZLING REGULATIONS IN CORK.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland whether he will now suspend the dogs muzzling regulations in the city and county of Cork.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin County, S.): A case of rabies occurred in the Fermoy union so recently as the 10th ultimo, the origin of which has not as yet been traced. Inquiry into the matter is still in progress, and in the circumstances it would be premature, at present, to relax the restrictions in the county and city of Cork.

NEWBLISS P.O.—DELIVERY OF TELEGRAMS BY GIRLS.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Department sanctions the practice of using girl telegraph learners to deliver postal messages, as in the case of the Newbliss post office; whether such practice prevails in any part of England; and will he issue instructions for this system to be discontinued.

MR. HANBURY: Yes, Sir; it is with the sanction of the Department that assistants at a post office like Newbliss, whether they be girls or boys, are employed in the delivery of telegraph (not postal) messages. Such a practice prevails in England.

LIMAVADY POSTMASTERSHIP.

MR. ARTHUR J. MOORE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can state how long the position of Postmaster of Limavady has been vacant and for what reason, and whether the Department are paying the late postmaster a rent for the present post office premises; and whether, seeing that such premises are small and ill-ventilated, and unsuitable for the requirements of the locality, the Department will take steps to appoint a postmaster and supply proper accommodation for the public.

MR. HANBURY: The postmastership of Limavady has been vacant since 1st November, 1899. The delay in filling the vacancy has been caused by necessary inquiries as to a revision of the arrangements for carrying on the work of the office, and inquiries with a view to finding the most suitable candidate to fill the vacancy. A rent is being paid to the late postmaster for the use of his premises. The vacancy will be filled on the earliest possible date, and one of the conditions of the appointment will be that the candidate provides accommodation for the work of the office.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not the case that all the north of Ireland is up in arms if a Catholic postmaster is appointed?

[No answer was given.]

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS' ARREARS OF FEE GRANT.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say when the Irish national teachers will receive the arrears of fee grant which accrued between the years 1893 and 1896.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have already more than once stated that the money cannot be paid until the Vote has been passed.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: When is it likely to be passed?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: We got the Vote the other day, but Report of it has still to be obtained.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION BOARD CLERKS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the clerks who are to receive pensions under the Intermediate Education Bill have been appointed by competitive examination; and, if not, how will future clerks be appointed.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The present clerks of the Board were not appointed by competitive examination. The appointment to these posts is vested by statute in the Board, and I am unable to say in what manner the power of appointment will be exercised hereafter.

ARMY (SUPPLEMENTARY) ESTIMATE, 1900-1901.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £11,500,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for Additional Expenditure, mainly due to the war in South Africa and to affairs in China, in respect of the following Army Services, viz. :—

Vote 1. Pay, etc., of the Army ...	3,250,000
Vote 2. Medical Establishment : Pay, etc. ...	350,000
Vote 5. Volunteer Corps: Pay and Allowances ...	500,000
Vote 6. Transport and Remounts ...	4,500,000
Vote 7. Provisions, Forage, and other Supplies ...	850,000
Vote 8. Clothing Establishments and Services ...	100,000
Vote 9. Warlike and other Stores ...	500,000
Vote 10. Works, etc. : Cost (including Staff for Engineer Services) ...	1,060,000
Vote 12. Miscellaneous Effective Services ...	140,000
Vote 14. Non-Effective Services, Officers ...	250,000
Total ...	£11,500,000"

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The presentation of this Supplementary Estimate for eleven and a half millions has been designedly delayed until a late period of the session, because it necessarily includes provision for two purposes—the continuance of the war in South Africa and the military operations in China, the extent and cost of which cannot with any accuracy be gauged. Indeed, in spite of this delay, it has not been possible to make a forecast which approaches to the accuracy which the Committee of Supply very properly expects in an ordinary year. This estimate has been framed to meet all the charges that will come in course of payment until the end of February, 1901. It leaves the month of March open, so that when the House reassembles it will be in the power of the Committee of the House to revise or to confirm the provisions that we have made in such a way as to see that our books balance at the end of the financial year. This Estimate is the second Army Estimate which it has been my duty to submit this year. It is the fourth Army Estimate I have had to submit since the beginning of the war. In the statements with which I introduced those previous Estimates, and in debates, I have already said all that, as it seemed to me, could usefully be said on some of those wider questions of military policy which arise out of Estimates of this magnitude. I do not propose this afternoon to repeat what I have said. I think that would serve no useful purpose. My views on the efforts made by this Government at the outbreak of the war, on the efforts made since to prosecute the war and provide for home defence, have been very fully laid before this Committee, and I should not be justified in travelling over the same ground again. But there are two other large questions of military policy which I have not yet discussed, and which I do not propose to discuss this afternoon. The first is the question of the operations of our Army in the field. At the beginning of the session it was generally felt that it would not be wise to criticise or discuss the strategy and tactics of our generals or the comparative value of the different arms of the service until the end of the war, and until the experience gained by the war had been analysed. There is another very important question which I do not propose to discuss. It is sometimes called "reorganisation" for brevity, for the word is not very explicit. What we mean by it is the fitting of the whole of our military system, of the War Office, and of the Army to meet the needs of the Empire and the conditions of modern warfare. The opinion was very generally entertained and expressed earlier in the year, and notably by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean and by the Leader of the Opposition, that a time of war is not a time for attacking these large questions of reconstruction and reorganisation. I shared the view then expressed; I hold it now, and I hope it is still generally shared. But there is one important question arising out of this war which I have been charged with unduly neglecting, particularly upon one occasion, and which certainly has been elbowing out of our debates by more exciting topics—I mean the question of the finance of the war. I plead guilty to having said very little about that during this session. How much has the war cost? How much is the war going to cost? Hon. Members cheer, and they have perhaps in their minds the sum total of all the totals which have been asked for, but these questions are not so simple as they seem. Following our procedure—and I think very properly following it, for reasons I gave last October—the procedure of distributing the sums for which we have obtained sanction over the Vote, with which we are familiar, it is very difficult to extricate from any one Estimate the amount which is directly chargeable for war, and still harder to extricate the total from those four Estimates, and it is very difficult to distinguish the charges which are directly due to the war from the charges which are indirectly due to the war, which are mainly but not wholly due to the war; the charges which have nothing to do with the war, and the charges for the permanent increase of our Army, whether at home or in certain other parts of the Empire outside South Africa. But, before I come to this question of the finance of the war—I gather that some members of the Committee would be glad that I should do so—I must, if I may so put it, get China out of the way, not because it is not a subject of the most vital importance, but because in respect of China I am here merely as an accountant. In so far as the organisation of the military expedition is concerned, my noble friend the Secretary of State for India, I imagine, would be able to give greater information than I can, and so far as the policy that points to the despatch of such an expedition is concerned I must refer hon. Members to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. All I have to do with is to state how much there is for China on this Supplementary Estimate. In order to repay the prime charge and the recurring charge up to the end of February, for the force which India has up till now put at our disposal, a sum of £1,574,000 is taken on various Votes in this Estimate. But recent experience has taught us that you cannot proceed in these matters on a narrow margin. There may be sickness, losses in China, and therefore the Estimate is increased in this Supplementary Estimate to the round number of £2,000,000. That leaves a margin for an expedition of the size which is now proposed—about 11,000 combatants and 4,000 coolies, with transports and other munitions of war. But would it be wise to tie our hands in such a manner that it would be impossible to send reinforcements? In the opinion of the Government it would not be wise. Therefore, in this Estimate a further sum of one million is taken as a second line of reserve in respect of China, and from the total of eleven and a half millions which appears on the face of the Estimate I must ask the Committee, before coming to the question of the finance of the war in South Africa, to deduct a round total of £3,000,000. These three millions are distributed over the Vote. That is done for reasons I urged last October, and it was, I think, very generally accepted that you cannot have proper account keeping if you pool all your accounts into a Vote on account during a time of exceptional necessity. It may be convenient to hon. Members that I should now recall to their minds the sums we have voted on previous Estimates in respect of South Africa—sums directly due to the war in South Africa. In the first Estimate in October last, the total of which was ten millions, the charges directly springing from the war were £9,434,000. In the second Supplementary Estimate introduced on 13th February, the sum for those direct charges was over £12,580,000. In the Estimates introduced on 12th March, the direct charge was a little over thirty-one and a half millions, and that was so stated on page 6 of the Estimates. Until now, therefore, the Committee of this House has sanctioned for charges arising directly out of the war in South Africa a total of £53,582,700.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): And eight millions now.

MR. WYNDHAM: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to make my statement in my own way. We cannot take the whole of the eight millions and a half for charges springing directly out of the war. I think it will be more convenient to deal first with charges springing directly out of the war, and then proceed with indirect charges, and then with charges that have nothing to do with the war at all. When I introduced the Estimate for the year for the war for thirty-one and a half millions I pointed out three things. I said we included nothing for what are called terminal charges, we included nothing for gratuities to troops in that Estimate, nor for the cost of transporting the troops back to this country, or India, or the colonies. In the second place, I said that those Estimates were framed under exceptional circumstances, that they partook somewhat of the nature of a "shot," and that it was impossible to present them with the accuracy which can be obtained in times of peace. In the third place, I pointed out that it had been necessary to divide what I have called war at full pressure from war at half pressure in a somewhat arbitrary manner. Of course, one merges by imperceptible degrees in the other, and so in turn does war at half pressure merge into what may be called military occupation when war has ceased. It is very difficult to distinguish quite accurately between these phases. In the Estimate of the year for the war, thirty-one and a half millions, the sum of half a million was taken for the huts in South Africa to accommodate the permanent garrison that would be left there, and that is a sum which cannot quite properly be considered a direct charge of the war. In this Estimate, omitting China, there is a sum of eight and a half millions. To what I will ask the Committee to apply the same consideration. It includes money for permanent charges, it includes money for the excess which has arisen from the fact that the first Estimate partook somewhat of the nature of a shot, and it includes a further sum for what I call military occupation. That is all it includes in respect of the war. I will deal with the terminal charges first. For transport for bringing the troops home we are asking sanction for £2,650,000. That is sufficient to take back the Indian contingent to India, to take the colonial contingent back to the colonies, and to bring 135,000 Imperial troops from Africa to this country. At this moment there are in South Africa 223,500 men in all, and of these 189,900 are Imperial troops and about 10,000 Indian troops. We are asking for sea transport to bring back 135,000 men, which leaves in South Africa about 45,000 men. The permanent garrison has been estimated by Lord Roberts at 30,000 men, and we have been advised from South Africa that some 15,000 men—Yeomen, colonists, and Reservists—may make their home there. Therefore no cause has so far arisen for providing for bringing back more troops than I have named. Then the other factor in the terminal charges consists of the gratuities. These have been calculated upon a basis of £5 as the unit. The private soldier will receive £5, and officers and others will receive multiples of that sum calculated in accordance with their rank. There is also provision made which will enable us to give a suit of plain clothes to every Reservist on his return, and further provision is made for the issue of a medal and other minor matters, into which I will go later on if I am asked. The total for gratuities taken in these Estimates is £2,950,000, which, added to the amount required for transport, gives a total for terminal charges in these Estimates of £5,600,000. Then I come to the second point, the question of excess over the Estimates for the year presented in March. Those Estimates were intended to meet the charges of the war for the financial year, for war at full pressure for six months, and at half pressure for the remaining moiety of the year, but of course they were framed some time before they were laid before the House, and before orders had been given for the 8th Division to proceed to South Africa. They were framed upon the basis of about 190,000 then being employed in South Africa, and the force there now, as I have told the Committee, numbers over 220,000. That being so, for what may fairly be called not a miscalculation, but a shortcoming in the Estimates submitted in March, we are taking now £1,090,000. But in these Estimates and in respect of the war there are other sums which come under the third head I have submitted, sums which partake of the character of provision for military occupation. There is one sum which I should like to explain, namely, £250,000 for rolling stock. When earlier in the session I said that Lord Roberts had asked for rolling stock, and that we had undertaken to provide it, it was held, somewhat unfairly, I think, that this was an oversight on the part of the Government. Rolling stock for a 3ft. 6in. gauge cannot be obtained within less than nine months, and there was no cause for providing it at the beginning of the war, and Lord Roberts applied to us on the ground that after the war the rolling stock would be exhausted to such an extent that for purposes of military occupation, it would be necessary to renew it to a certain amount. For that we are now asking £250,000. And then also under this third head of sums which fall rather under the head of military occupation there is a further £500,000 to provide huts for the garrison left in South Africa, making in all £1,000,000 for that service. In these Estimates for the war in South Africa we are asking for £7,440,000, and it may interest the Committee to know that the total in all the Estimates for charges arising out of the war is £61,220,700; but that includes £1,000,000 for huts and £250,000 for rolling stock. That takes us, if our forecasts are accurate, to the end of February next year, and I do not think that any large sum in addition will have to be asked for when Parliament meets. But there are other charges which arise indirectly out of the war, and if the Committee care to have them I can give them. In the Estimates of October last there was a sum of £566,000 for the embodiment of the Militia and raising certain artillery batteries and cavalry regiments from the lower to the higher standard. That I call an indirect charge. In the February Estimate there was a charge of £400,000 for the further embodiment of the Militia. In the Estimates for the year we took £6,228,000 for what is called the emergency scheme for home defence, and in these Estimates we are taking £500,000. That charge arises out of the magnificent response made by the Volunteers to meet the facilities offered to them under that scheme. It may interest the Committee to know that there will be or have been in camp for fourteen days 59 Volunteer artillery corps out of 66, 26 engineer corps out of 28, and 203 infantry corps out of 216, or, in all, about 150,000 men out of about 240,000. I call that a magnificent response. All these are receiving allowances for transport which enable them to bring into camp about one-half of the transport they would require in war. Of course, the whole of the Militia has been embodied, and transport has been provided for the Militia out of Government stores and horses out of the Remount Department. It is entirely in consequence of the Volunteers that there has been this further sum of £500,000 upon the Estimate now submitted, and that sum ought to be credited to what I call excess, though the result of the expenditure is one on which I congratulate myself and the country. Then I come to the permanent charge in this Estimate. We are taking a further sum of £500,000 for huts in this country. When I introduced the Estimates of the year I pointed out that there might be some overlapping in consequence of the return of some of the troops before we were in a position to disembody the Militia; but even with that we shall be in great straits when the camping season comes to an end. We have 50,000 more men in this country than we can accommodate in barracks. Therefore it is necessary to increase the estimate for hutting in order to provide against overlapping. That is one of those services which it is rather hard to characterise accurately. In a sense it is part of the emergency scheme for home defence, because it provides accommodation for the Militia who have been embodied this year; but pains have been taken to secure a pattern of hut which will last for some time, and which will be available for housing some of the permanent increase of the Army; so the charge partakes of the nature of a charge arising out of the emergency scheme and also of the nature of a charge for the permanent service. I think the amount is very satisfactorily booked to disclose its nature, because, as the first part was put as an emergency charge in the Estimates of the year, I consider this part may be put as a permanent charge. Then in this Estimate there are three other services of a permanent nature. The Committee will recollect that in the case of the Loans Bill of last year, in deference to views which were expressed, I put the schedule into the Act. I first submitted it as a Parliamentary Paper, but was asked to put it into the Act. That being so, it is impossible to begin a new service without coming to this House for Parliamentary sanction. There is one service I recommend with some confidence to the Committee, and that is for barracks at Khartoum. Sir Francis Wingate has recommended that it is necessary to have a battalion at Khartoum not only for the health of our troops, but also for the effect on the country we have recently settled, and that it is wise to build permanent barracks and unwise to put up huts or tents as having a tendency to show we had come to stay. Therefore in this Estimate we are asking for £35,000 for barracks at Khartoum; and we are also asking for £15,000 for barracks at Mauritius. Hon. Members may remember that when I introduced the Estimates of the year I said there was to be a new foreign roster on a small scale for the Indian Army. They were to raise two more battalions than they needed for India in order to provide a garrison for Mauritius. Then we take £10,000 in order that the men of the Reserve may receive 6d. instead of 4d. a day in consequence of the heavier obligations placed upon them. Thus in this Estimate we are taking £560,000 for the permanent services which have nothing to do with the war at all, £500,000 for the emergency scheme, more or less, £7,440,000 for the war in South Africa, and £3,000,000 for China. I must apologise to the Committee for having to ask it to follow me in these intricate figures. The £560,000 includes a small sum for a very important service, and, if sanctioned by the Committee, will commit this House—as far as one House of Commons can commit another—to heavy expenditure in the future. Perhaps I may be allowed to lead up to that by completing, in respect of the permanent increase, the task I have undertaken as regards direct and indirect charges. In February's Supplementary Estimate, the Committee voted £20,000 towards the permanent increase of artillery. In the War Estimates of the year we voted £1,925,000 towards the permanent increase of four battalions of infantry. That included, as I was careful to state at the time, a sum of £48,000 to enable us to begin setting up store-houses in different parts of the United Kingdom, because it was the intention of the Government to provide in larger quantities fixed reserves of stores, the cause of that being that it would not any longer be prudent, or indeed possible, to pile them up at Pimlico or Woolwich, and that it was desirable to distribute them at appropriate places throughout the United Kingdom. In that Estimate we took £10,000 to purchase some of the articles which are to be put in the store-houses. But that sum gives no indication of the size of our operations, because of a fact which I think I can easily explain. In the Estimates for the year we took £750,000 to provide the Volunteer artillery with 4·7 guns. The whole of that provision cannot be got before next year, and there will be a balance available which will enable us to lose no time in obtaining so much of these stores before the end of February. Therefore I am perfectly frank with the Committee. We have come to ask the Committee to confirm the sanction which it has indeed given by passing the sum of £48,000 in the Estimates of the year.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the hon. Gentleman give the nature of the stores?

MR. WYNDHAM: That is a matter I shall now deal with. It is one of very great importance. Perhaps in reply to that question which has been put to me I may ask the Committee to consider what we mean by reserve of stores. We do not mean mobilisation stores. A confusion is often entertained upon that subject. We have had in this country for many years past a complete mobilisation equipment for a large force—two army corps. By a reserve of stores you mean something more than that. You mean a reserve of stores which will enable an army once in the field to remain there without throwing an undue tax on the productive powers of the ordnance factories or trade. By a reserve of stores you mean you will have a fixed amount of these various articles, munitions of war and clothing, and maintain them at that fixed rate. That can be done by treating such a reserve as you treat a cistern or a reservoir. What you take out at one end you must put in at the other. That is very necessary, because there are two very difficult factors in the problem of providing reserves of stores for a military force. Perishability is the first. It is no use piling up stores and saying you will leave them there for ten or fifteen years. It varies in respect of different articles. Saddlery or harness will remain of value for a very much longer period, for example, than clothing. Another difficult factor in arriving at any policy of reserve stores is the expansibility of output of manufacture, whether at the ordnance factories or throughout the trade of the country. I know it has been said outside these walls that the Government are to blame for not having solved this problem more swiftly and at an earlier date. Is that a reasonable complaint? During several years, from 1895, the Government, with the assistance and support of the House, have been slowly and with difficulty increasing the establishment of our Army, and before there was any idea we were to go to war. Would it have been economical or sensible to pile up arms by nine battalions of infantry and sixteen batteries of artillery before the outbreak of the war, and before there was any idea that we were about to go to war? Would it have been economical or sensible to pile up clothing and equipment and great reserves of stores for a force which was not then in existence, but which we were seeking to create under circumstances of great difficulty, because raising the establishment in this country is a difficult thing, owing to the fact that recruiting varies from year to year? To plunge, without consideration, into the purchase of reserves of stores before you had reached the standard you proposed to yourself for the establishment of your Army would have been a thing no Government could have defended before the Committee. At the beginning of 1899 we were within measurable distance of reaching this standard in the establishment of the Army. The House has sanctioned since 1895 25,508 additional men; and when we arrived at the standard we proposed—namely, one which would enable us to mobilise two army corps—General Brackenbury became Director General of Ordnance. It became necessary to solve with every possible accuracy the question of perishability of material and the output of ordnance factories. A Committee was appointed which heard evidence not only from the contractors and the Director General of Ordnance and those who serve under him, but also from very nearly all the principal manufacturers in this country; so we had before us evidence which had to be sifted and examined if we were to hope for any proper solution of this very difficult problem of providing a reserve of stores. We propose to complete the equipment for horse artillery, field and siege artillery, and to increase the reserve of ammunition for these guns. The calculations have been made for the addition to the establishment of the Army of something like 25,000 men. There will be complete equipment for the artillery and a reserve of one battery to every four on the establishment. There will be machine guns for the infantry battalions and a reserve of 25 per cent. of guns and carriages. Now I come to the ordnance stores. What are they? The accoutrements, saddlery and harness, and all that is necessary for an army in the field. That has been calculated on the basis that we should have a reserve sufficient to maintain in the field for six months a force of three army corps, or 135,000 men. We might have an outbreak of influenza in a cavalry regiment, and the whole of the harness might become infected. Where, therefore, certain stores are subjected to higher risk, a higher rate of reserve has been calculated, and in respect of the ordnance stores for the force I have named a reserve will be provided for the whole establishment. As to clothing, the reserve is calculated on the basis that there should be sufficient to put into the field and maintain for six months in the field the force I have named, and beyond that there should be a reserve of six months clothing for the whole Army as a working margin, since the clothing is to be distributed at many different places. It is not possible to secure a reserve of clothing unless you can secure uniformity in clothing, and that is why the Government have come to the conclusion that the British Army will have to have one working dress for all branches and regiments of the service. Until it was possible to do that, and it has been found possible only owing to this war, it would have been insanity to pile up reserves of clothing of a pattern which no army would under any conceivable circumstances put on when it was called upon to fight. I think that is all I need say about this reserve of stores. With certain not very large alterations we have made in the Arsenal, in the way of shifting the "danger" buildings away from the other sheds and so forth, the total provision for these reserves of stores would come to something like £4,692,711. I would like the Committee to concentrate their attention on this question of the reserve of stores—ordnance stores and clothing—for a force of the size which I have named. Naturally we cannot spend that sum all at once. It will take some three years to spend a sum of that magnitude. But in this Vote and in the grant of money allocated for 4·7 guns, which cannot be spent before February, we have enough to push ahead at a very rapid rate; and we intend to push ahead at a very rapid rate unless the Committee should refuse us Parliamentary sanction. I cannot expect such a vote from this Committee. We are often urged to fix responsibility upon individuals or upon bodies. It is very easy to fix responsibility here. The Director General of Ordnance, who has made his calculations and submitted them, is not responsible if they are rejected. The Army Board and the Commander-in-Chief, who have endorsed them, are not responsible; the Secretary of State who submitted them to the Exchequer is not responsible; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has most liberally undertaken to make the necessary provision, can never be held responsible. The only people who will be held responsible if this policy is not endorsed is the Committee of this House. I do submit to the Committee that it should endorse the liberal policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is true that one Parliament cannot bind another. But I ask the Committee to treat the Army in this matter as well as it treats the Navy. The Navy is allowed by Votes upon Estimates to begin services which cannot be completed until after a period of years. How can we expect the manufacturers of this country to fix their plant and their staff at a number which will supply the needs of the Empire in time of crisis unless we can go to them with some continuous policy? Are we to force them in the future as we have forced them in the past to look not to the needs of their own Empire, but to adventitious orders from South American Republics or barbarous States? That is the question. Unless you provide for the expansibility of output in a trade when the day of national crises comes this country will be unprepared. I respectfully submit this proposal in addition to the Estimates, and I trust the Committee will unanimously endorse the policy which has been adopted by the Government. I beg to move.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): The hon. Member the Under Secretary of State for War is such a favourite with the House that I am sure the Committee will welcome him in a new character. He has spoken to-night so exclusively upon finance that I almost thought I was listening to the annual Budget speech, and I am sure if in course of time the Chancellor of the Exchequer desires to change his office for another, we should find in the hon. Member a fit successor. The hon. Gentleman suggested that we should concentrate our attention especially on the question of the reserves of warlike stores. There certainly can be no one in the House who attaches greater importance than I do to the arrangements for a proper reserve of warlike stores; but we shall have all next week in which hon. Members who are greatly interested in finance will be able to discuss the financial aspects of the proposals now before the House, whereas to-night is the only opportunity we shall have during this session for discussing military problems, and to-night is the proper occasion for so doing. The hon. Member, in his very lucid statement, was guilty of a few omissions, although, of course, he said he would be glad to deal with any questions which might arise in the course of the debate. I ventured to ask him across the House whether there were any savings upon several of the heads upon which money was taken in connection with the emergency proposals at the beginning of the present war, because the War Office, like the Admiralty, has the power to divert, with the leave of the Treasury, savings from one head to another, and money which we have voted for one purpose may be devoted to another.

MR. WYNDHAM was understood to say that he referred to one case of that character.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I asked especially with regard to the statement the hon.

Member made as to an excess of £500,000 on the emergency Volunteer proposal. But has there not been a large saving on that head in respect of the Royal Reserve battalions? Has anything like the amount voted by this Committee at the beginning of the year been spent for the pay and other expenses of the Royal Reserve battalions? The hon. Gentleman appeared to draw some distinction between the proposals which the Government make to the Committee and the proposals which the Committee agree to. He told us that the responsibility in these matters did not lie with the Commander-in-Chief or even with the Secretary of State, but with the Committee of the House of Commons. Our complaint in the past has always been—and I think with truth—that while the Committee of this House was willing to grant all that was asked for, and never refused anything that was asked for by the responsible Government for the safety of the country, the proposals made by the Government were often inadequate. I desire to ask also whether the hon. Member can give us to-night some information a little more definite and a little more reassuring than the perfunctory answers which have been given in both Houses with regard to the condition in which the Royal Reserve battalions have stood. We have eyes ourselves, and many Members have looked at these things for themselves, and seen the Royal Reserve battalions in Ireland, at Aldershot, and in London. A very large proportion of the men were left to loaf, they were not supplied with clothing or arms, and they were not in a condition to do their work or to help in the ordinary drill. These notorious facts have not been admitted with the frankness with which they might have been. We are all familiar with the well-known case of an Irish cavalry Reserve regiment which was left until June without any of the necessities of a cavalry regiment, so that drill was impossible. These occurrences have proved the wisdom of hon. Members who expressed grave doubts as to this Royal Reserve battalion system for which we voted so enormous a sum of money in the original Estimates of the year. Another point upon which the hon. Member has not, I think, been frank with the House, but with which I have no doubt he will deal later on, is the question of the Army Medical Department. There is an enormous Vote here for that Department, but the hon. Member has not said one word with regard to it. Considering the interest taken by the House lately in this subject, I think he ought to have explained to us what proportion of the Vote is for China, what proportion is for South Africa, and to what the South African proportion is intended to be devoted. It is easy for the Committee to vote large sums of money for the Army Medical Department, but the utility of voting those sums and the possibility by their means of coping with difficulties such as have recently arisen is another matter. There is no ground for wandering about the world in search of the actual facts. The facts are now officially admitted. It is admitted that in recent operations the Army Medical Department transport has been cut down to one-fifth of the regulation allowance, and under these circumstances the scandals which have arisen have been but the necessary result of the course which was taken—a course which had never previously been taken by the great military nations, and which has not been taken even under circumstances of the most extreme pressure by Germany. Another point to which the hon. Gentleman omitted to allude is the question of the additional gratuities which may have to be given. I do not know whether money is being taken for that purpose or not, but the Government are pledged by the statement they made after the unanimous vote of this House on the subject to do their utmost in the direction of an extension to the Army of the principles of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The Government said they could not carry out the actual terms of the resolution, but they promised to act in that direction, and to make a very considerable increase of the allowances, especially to the widow in cases of death. There is another matter which the hon. Gentleman has not mentioned except incidentally. He is taking money on this Vote for transport to take the white forces back to India, but he has not told us at what date the Government hope to restore those troops to India. At the beginning of the war the Government pledged themselves that it would be the first duty to replace the white forces. I understand that that arrangement continues, and therefore, as troops are withdrawn from Africa as occasion arises, the Indian forces will be the first to be withdrawn. But the objections which many of us entertained to drawing so largely upon India continue; they have not lost force in the time which has elapsed. The state of things on the Afghan frontier, for instance, is not such at the present time as to permit with safety such a great diminution of white troops in India as has taken place in connection with this war. The hon. Gentleman made a very interesting statement to the Committee with regard to one item in the accounts he has placed before us concerning the rolling stock. I understand that this rolling stock is to take the place of rolling stock which may have been worn during the war. There is a fact in connection with that which I think is not well known to the Committee—namely, that we have paid throughout this war the fare of every soldier or horse conveyed by the Cape Railway. No soldier has been allowed to be moved, even under the most pressing circumstances, in the course of the military operations without the money being paid, so that this wear and tear of rolling stock has already been paid for, and it may be urged after the war that in replacing this rolling stock we are paying twice over on this point. The hon. Gentleman has deprecated the raising of questions of strategy during the war, and he has repeated what he said in the earlier part of the session as to the unwisdom of debating such subjects during the progress of the war. But I would point out that this is the only occasion we shall have for asking questions and calling attention to certain matters as to which we have no knowledge at the present time, although such knowledge necessarily bears upon the future reorganisation of the Army. They are matters upon which we cannot press for knowledge at any given moment, but we must point out the danger there is, if we leave these matters entirely in the hands of the Government, that that moment may never come. In the first debate on this subject in the present session some of us called attention to the successive checks and reverses, in many of which we have left prisoners in the hands of the enemy. Frequent questions have been put about them in the House. This war has been marked, as everybody knows, in a most extraordinary and entirely unprecedented degree, as far as the British Army is concerned, by the frequency of surrenders of small posts and unwounded prisoners. When we called attention to these matters in February last there had been two armoured trains, with two guns and 100 men; 300 men of the 18th Hussars and mounted infantry were captured after Glencoe; six companies were taken at Nicholson's Nek; then there was Farquhar's Farm. There was also the Stormberg reverse, with the loss of two guns and over 600 men; and there were the operations of Lord Methuen and Sir Redvers Buller, who lost eleven guns and 800 men, besides the disaster to the Suffolks. The same thing has continued since, and there is a necessity that at some time or another we should know, for the sake of the future training and recruiting of the Army, where the blame is to be fixed.

MR. WYNDHAM: Hear, hear!

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: The greatest writer who has written on military questions has said—

"Artillery and prisoners are at all times regarded as the true trophies of victory as well as its measure, because through these things its extent is declared beyond a doubt. Even the degree of moral superiority may be better judged by them than by any other relation."

During this war we have in an extraordinary number of cases lost unwounded prisoners to the enemy, which must be the result of the grossest mismanagement, or must bear essentially on our system of recruiting. We have also failed to capture the guns of the enemy in the same degree as they have captured ours, which shows a defect in the conduct of the operations of our cavalry. On the 10th May† a Conservative Member of this House asked a question which led to an exchange of views upon this subject across the floor of the House, which was considered thoroughly satisfactory at the time, but which seems to have become a little weak ever since. In a question on the 10th May, as in a question to-night, reference was made to previous cases of surrender, and the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary said that by the Queen's regulations a court of inquiry in every case would be held as soon as possible after the return of the prisoners to duty. In that case the Under Secretary answered "yes," but in answer to a similar question to-night he has been less clear. He has stated that some sort of inquiry is to be held, but I begin to fear that unless the Committee presses the Government we have no security that these matters will really be probed to the bottom at some time. These prisoners returned to their duty in June. In answer to a question as to a particular surrender of Yeomanry, the Under Secretary said that an inquiry could not be held because the prisoners had not been recovered. In the case of the vast majority of prisoners at Pretoria they returned to duty and had been employed in war since. Some of them had been captured again, not by their own fault, but because they were armed with an inferior rifle. On the 10th May last the Under Secretary was asked what form the inquiry would take, and he used these words—

"In the first instance the inquiry will be by the Commander-in-Chief at the theatre of war."

I confess I gathered from that that the matter would afterwards be reviewed by the Government, and the country would be informed of the result, if it was thought safe, in order that we might have that knowledge which has so essential a bearing upon the training of the Army. Instead of using the words "in the first instance" and "at the end of the war," which were used on the 10th May, they have assumed that some sort of inquiry may have been held without anybody knowing anything about it.

MR. WYNDHAM: The right hon. Gentleman misunderstands the nature of my answers. My answer to-day was that we have not the information.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I only want to enforce the necessity of having this information at some time or other.

MR. WYNDHAM: Hear, hear!

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: We do not want to worry Lord Roberts and interfere with his discretion in any way, but we do want to be quite certain that sooner or later we shall have these facts before us. The Leader of the House the other day, in the course of the debate, appeared to think that substantially no great harm had been done by the censorship, and he seemed to think that the country knew everything already because there had been no censorship of letters. He spoke of the correspondence, and when somebody asked him a question about censorship he said there was no censorship of letters. But surely the right hon. Gentleman is aware that in many parts of the theatre of war there has been a very strict censorship of letters.

MR. WYNDHAM: There was a censorship of letters for a time; but since February there has been no censorship at all of press letters from the front.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: There was a censorship on letters from Ladysmith till February, at any rate; and while everybody knew exactly what happened at Nicholson's Nek on "mournful Monday," no one knows what happened on the same day at Farquhar's Farm, simply because of the censorship. We know that the troops were afterwards shut up in Ladysmith, and during the siege every letter had to be posted open.

MR. WYNDHAM: Were the letters of the late Mr. Steevens censored?

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Experienced correspondents like the late Mr. Steevens and Mr. Bennett Burleigh knew what they might write at a given time. But all letters were posted open during the siege of Ladysmith, and consequently they were read by the censor, and passages were struck out. I do not pretend to say that that was an improper practice in a besieged town, but that throws greater responsibility upon us at a later stage to see that these lessons are not lost, and that we should face the facts. Some of the facts did get out. A very admirable letter appeared in the Calcutta Englishman on 24th April after the censorship had been removed. Alluding to what passed at Farquhar's Farm on "mournful Monday" the Calcutta Englishman says—

"One cannot speak too strongly on the subject. To remain silent . . . after our experiences in South Africa is to court a national disaster."

I should not quote those words unless I entirely agreed with them, and I make that statement after having seen several officers who share my view, and after having had the advantage of reading the letters of two officers concerned in these operations, who were afterwards killed, and whose letters have come home since. What occurred there is a matter which it is essential to investigate in order that we should know the truth, for it has an essential bearing upon the training and the recruiting of the Army; and further, it is one of those cases which, if not kept in view, might possibly escape attention, because it is not a case of the surrender of unwounded prisoners. These facts bear not only upon the general training of the officers and staff, but also upon the power of handling troops of all arms and upon the necessity of not isolating detachments of infantry without any guns or cavalry. Upon such matters as scouting and entrenching, the failure of our troops has been officially admitted. The House will remember that at Spion Kop in order to entrench it was necessary to send for the Royal Engineers—a thing which could not have happened in any other Army. The Under Secretary was asked to-night a question with regard to the great loss of prisoners which has continued since the war was said to have come virtually to an end. Since our last discussion upon the subject there have been constant instances of this kind. There was a surrender of convoys in February and in March, and the operations of the 31st March at Koorn Spruit or Sanna's Post, which resulted in the loss of seven guns and over 400 men. The incident at Sanna's Post shows the way in which, unless constant pressure is kept up here, information is forgotten to be given. We have had very full information with regard to the successful portion of that operation; four Victoria Crosses have been most properly given for conspicuous gallantry, and the account of that gallantry is rightly given. But, on the other hand, it is necessary that we should know how it came that there was such an extraordinary deficiency of scouting and military knowledge as to have led to so unprecedented a result. Then there was Reddersburg and 400 men; in May there was a squadron of Bethune's Horse with a Maxim; in May also there was the surprise of Sir Charles Warren—a surprise which cannot be alluded to without remembering that Sir Charles Warren was an officer who had been given high command without having had any recent military experience, and an officer in a position so high that I take it—I am not sure of this, but I take it in accordance with precedent—that his appointment was a Cabinet appointment.

VOL. LXXXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Sir Charles Warren was probably employed in South Africa on the strength of his successful Bechuanaland Expedition. But that was an expedition in which not a shot was fired, and the surprise of Sir Charles Warren in May is a matter which deserves inquiry. Then there was the surrender in June on two occasions of Yeomanry, alluded to to-night in the question of the hon. Member for Wandsworth. Then, also in June, there was a convoy with 160 Highlanders and the surrender of the Derbyshire Militia—a surrender which seems to me to reflect great discredit upon someone concerned with the staff arrangements there. To send a regiment of Militia by themselves without guns to occupy a position in face of an active enemy seems to me really to court disaster. A matter of this kind, which is almost without precedent, does seem to me to require attention. On the 14th June there was the most distressful incident of all, because it led to a repetition at Pretoria of those hardships which had been experienced by the army at Bloemfontein. We all know what the hardships at Bloemfontein have been, and they have been repeated at Pretoria. I do not say they have been repeated in all their incidents, but repeated as regards lack of food and extreme pressure and strain. The incident I refer to is the capture of the mail train and sixty men on the 14th June, when there was a destruction of an immense amount of ammunition, of the whole of the mails for a very long period, and of the warm clothing of the men. I imagine that money was also captured on that occasion, because it is undoubtedly the case that the troops at Pretoria went without their pay for some time, which is most unusual in the British Army. Then in July came Nitral's Nek. The affair at Nitral's Nek is a very remarkable occurrence of a wholly different kind from others we have known. The case of Nitral's Nek is almost the only one in which there was a detachment of all arms captured. There were a squadron of cavalry, two guns, Royal Horse Artillery, a number of mounted infantry, and a number of infantry in this surrender. The two last incidents, about which at present we know nothing, are the surrender of the supply train with 100 men and the surrender of another supply train with 200 Welsh Fusiliers. This is a distressing catalogue, but it is a catalogue to which we must not shut our eyes. It is a catalogue known in every country in the world, and written about by every military writer in the world. The facts must be fully inquired into; they must not be hid; their bearing on the character of the training of our Army must be ascertained. The only point as to which at the present moment I should like to ask a question, arising out of the recent surrenders, concerns the horses—the remounts. The Under Secretary made a very full statement with regard to the responsibility of the Government in the matter of remounts some months ago. While it was undoubtedly most difficult to get horses up to Bloemfontein when there was great trouble on the lines of communication, and while now it may be very difficult to get horses up to Pretoria—I believe that at this moment the cavalry and mounted infantry at Pretoria have only one-fourth of their proper number of horses—it would seem on the face of things that there ought now to be no difficulty in having a full supply in the Orange River Colony. Yet, if there had been a full supply in the Orange River Colony, it would not have been necessary to send the Derbyshire Militia without guns and without cavalry, and probably the disasters on the lines of communication would have been avoided. I should like information on that point. The foreign writers who have written on these surrenders have not, as a rule, been unprejudiced men; and they have not in all cases been the best men in their various services, but there have been among them two men of very considerable standing, one of whom, General Von Blume, is peculiarly competent to write on the subject. He was Moltke's second assistant, he was an assistant in strategy, he wrote a great book on the operations of the German army from Sedan, and he has written recently the greatest of modern books on strategy. General Von Blume has answered conclusively what he calls "the conventional lie" that these troubles of ours have been due to new conditions of warfare. He points out the reasons which induce him to believe that every difficulty could have been foreseen, that there was nothing we ought not to have expected, and that the mistakes which have been made, and have had the results I have described, have been mistakes on immutable and permanent principles, and not because of anything new or peculiar in the present war. We are a military nation and have the military spirit, and I believe if we are told the truth in regard to these matters before interest in them has gone we shall be able to take the lessons to our hearts. There need be no asperity between the War Office and its critics upon these subjects. One of the great testimonies to the ability of the Under Secretary of State for War is the fact that, while we may have our differences with his Secretary of State, when he speaks in this House we are always inclined to believe that he really agrees with us beforehand, and that we should be in a better position if he had his way. I do not know whether that is so or not, but he gives us that impression, and we always speak with the feeling that we are speaking to one of ourselves. I do not wish to attack him in any way; we are all anxious to train the Army for war. We believe that the Army has not been properly trained for war in the past, and I doubt myself whether it is being properly so trained at the present moment at Aldershot Camp. I am bound to say from what I have heard from far better authorities than I can pretend to be that I very much doubt whether the training at Aldershot Camp even in this critical year has been of a nature really to prepare the Army for war. We are all determined that the training should be better in the future. After Lord Roberts and the men who have been of the most assistance to him on the staff have come home we shall be able to back them in any efforts they may make for improving the training of the Army for war; but we shall back them only if we have full knowledge, not if we are left in a condition of ignorance. I have two practical suggestions to throw out on that subject. I hope Lord Roberts will not be employed upon civil duty and so kept from giving us the full benefit of the enormous knowledge and the experience he has acquired with regard to the training of the British Army, but that he may be asked by the Government to write a general Report upon the points in regard to which he thinks the war has shown defects in the training and constitution of our Army and the respects in which he thinks it may be improved—how and why. In addition to that I hope the Government will propose to the House—which never refuses, as the Under Secretary seemed to think it might, the proposals of the War Office—a large contribution to the expenses of the Intelligence Department for a military history of the war. This work cannot be undertaken on the funds at present allocated; it cannot be done rapidly until there is a special Vote for the purpose. I would suggest there should be a Vote of £10,000 for the purpose of doing that which no private individual can do—of making, with full knowledge, a history of the war as sound and as frank as the Prussian official history of the war of 1870-71—a history brought out rapidly instead of years afterwards, when all interest in the subject has evaporated except to students. I believe such a work would do much towards bringing about the end we all desire—namely, that at the termination of the war we should not lose the whole of the benefit of its lessons in mere congratulation.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I desire to call attention very briefly to the remarkable policy of concealment adopted by the Government in reference to one or two very important matters at the seat of war during the last few months. I altogether fail to understand a policy which, to my mind, is Chinese and ostrich-like, and which, while making unpopular in the country a Government which, in my opinion, deserves the support of the nation, is doing no good whatever. I have heard of people running their heads against brick walls, but until now I never knew people to erect the brick wall to run their heads against as the War Office have done in this particular matter. The hon. Member for South Donegal, a little while ago, put a question to the Under Secretary for War in reference to one of these occurrences to which reference has been made, and he was told that no information was available. I, with some temerity perhaps, ventured to put a supplementary question to the hon. Gentleman, and was told that nobody knew the circumstances of the case except the Commander-in-Chief and the headquarters staff. That showed at once to my mind how badly the hon. Gentleman is served by his friends and subordinates. Everybody who knows anything about a camp knows that it is the home of all sorts of rumours and stories; it is impossible to conceal anything in a camp; and yet we are told that the hundreds of thousands of men in South Africa do not know what I know to be common knowledge. If there is one thing in which the British private soldier takes the keenest possible interest more than another it is in what his generals and officers are doing; and the hon. Gentleman takes up a considerable portion of his speech with references to the question of stores and equipment! That very question makes me very doubtful as to the possibility of the Army or the War Office being reformed within any reasonable time by the present Secretary for War. What did the Secretary for War tell the country the other day? He said that the stores and equipment were not sufficiently maintained. Again, he said three months ago at a public meeting that he was struck by the fact that there was a considerable deficiency, amounting to four and a half millions. This is a gentleman who is no irresponsible critic. He has been at the War Office for five years, and has been able to do absolutely what he liked. When he took up the fiddle, the rest had to dance to his music until he had finished. And he comes to Parliament at the eleventh hour and says that he is aware that the stores and equipment are deficient! How can we expect anything from a statesman, the Secretary for War, who is so absolutely unprepared for circumstances which must occur, as Lord Lansdowne has shown himself to be in this matter? The Under Secretary for War told us about the system, and he said he hoped in future to put as much into the system of reserve stores and equipments as he took out of it. It is common knowledge that that ought to have been done during the last six years, and not to have thought of it at the last moment. To the Secretary for War, and those higher than he, we look for the reorganisation of the War Office. The noble Marquess the head of the Government told us the other day that the defence of the country was not the business of the War Office, and he proposed to hand it over to the Grand Councilors of the Primrose League. Then we were told that Lord Lansdowne proposed to wait till these distinguished soldiers came back from South Africa. But what do these distinguished soldiers know of the War Office and its reorganisation? They are not bureaucrats; they are soldiers. They know nothing about the distribution of clerks in Pall Mall. It is not to the soldiers, who do not know that these misfortunes have come upon us owing to the disorganisation of the War Office, that we should look for reorganisation. Anyone who wants to know what is wrong with the War Office, and what we ought to do, need not wait till these soldiers, distinguished or undistinguished, come home. All he has got to do is to read the Report of the Hartington Commission, and then take up the Report of the Committee presided over by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs of three years ago, and he will see that it is absolutely impossible to have a reformed Army with an unreformed War Office. We are told that when the Army comes back from South Africa we shall be in a position of safety. But it is no use living in a fool's paradise or leaning on a broken reed. The other day the Under Secretary for War stated that 204,000 men had been sent out from this country to South Africa, and in addition to these there were 29,000 colonial irregular troops. Out of that total of 233,000 you have to deduct 28,000 in round numbers who have been killed, wounded, are sick or invalided home. Then you must deduct 12,000 more—the Yeomanry, Volunteers, Militia, and Army Reserves, who must return to civil life. Then you must further deduct the 10,000 men stolen from India, and the 15,000 withdrawn from the Mediterranean, and the permanent garrison to be left in South Africa, which the hon. Gentleman puts at 45,000. The result will be that instead of being, as the Secretary for War stated in public recently, able to have a body of 160,000 trained soldiers to do what you like with, the whole number of men would not amount to more than 30,000. We are told about the Reserve battalions, some of which, however, have not rifles or even belts, and which must be automatically dissolved in a few months, and cannot be sent out of the country, and which have cost two millions of money. That is not much to fall back upon, especially when, after the French Exhibition is over, it is possible we must look more closely to our defence. I have always been unable to understand the plans of the War Office as presented to this House. The War Office take the Reserve and, instead of that body being used as a reserve, it is thrown into the fighting line. Then the Militia are supposed to be for home defence, but they are sent abroad. The Militia Reserve has nothing to do with the Militia, but is sent as Regulars to duty at Gibraltar and at the home stations. These are among the many conundrums propounded at the War Office which I fail to understand.

Maj. Rasch.

Again, when the war is over one plan is to take the Reserve elsewhere, leaving the Empire to be guarded by an insufficient force—as it has been ever since we took over Egypt in 1882. Then we are told that the ballot for the Militia means carrying destruction to every cottage in the land and driving the people to emigrate. I think the noble Marquess who said that cannot have a very high opinion of the patriotism of this country. The most sensible plan, in my opinion, would be to raise the pay of the Regulars and the Militia until we get the right sort of men to join. If any gentleman desires to know what will ameliorate the condition of the soldier and induce him to enlist, I recommend him to read an excellent article in this morning's Daily News, which used to be considered the organ of the Nonconformists and Liberals, but has always taken a strong view of the Army. There is another course which I would like to recommend myself: that is to eviscerate, or rather to exterminate, if possible, the whole of what Sir George Chesney used to call the epitome of organisation run mad in Pall Mall—the War Office. I am afraid that will not happen in my time. If it did, nobody would be more delighted than myself, and I would be able to sing Nunc dimittis.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I have only one observation to make. It is that I have had most reliable information that the British Minister and all the Ministers in Peking were safe on the 24th of this month.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I take it that my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War is in full sympathy with the demand for an inquiry into events in South Africa; but I think it would be desirable if he gave a really distinct, explicit, and binding assurance on the part of the Government that the inquiry will be taken in hand. I entirely agree with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean as to voting a sum of money for a complete history of the war, but I trust if that is done it will not be used as a lever to postpone the inquiry. As I understood my hon. friend, the gratuity to the returned soldiers is to an average of £5 a head. And then he proceeded to say that the privates were to receive £5 and officers a multiple of £5. I cannot see how that would make £5 per unit.

MR. WYNDHAM: What I said was that the gratuities were calculated upon a basis of £5 as the unit. That is a technical term. The private soldier will receive £5 and the officers multiples of that sum calculated according to their rank.

SIR J. COLOMB: I am glad of that explanation. There is another point which the Government would seriously have to consider—the principle of the new departure to be made in regard to old age pensions for every man who has fought for Her Majesty. I urge that that is the principle which ought to be adopted, because if the Government comes down here with a proposal for meeting the necessities of the Empire in respect of inducements to recruits, I cannot see how this question can be approached with any chance of success unless one of the inducements offered to the men is old age pensions. The only other point I wish to refer to is in connection with the reserve of stores. I do not think anything shows more completely that in the past the War Office has neglected its business than the fact that we have had no reserve at all. It is to the credit of my hon. friend that the Government have at last announced their intention of establishing a system by which there will be maintained for the service of the Empire an adequate proportion of surplus stores. That I congratulate the Government upon doing. My hon. friend to-day pointed out how essential this was. We all agreed with his desire to bind the House to this principle. I confess I wish the Government could bind the House a little more like naval programmes. We have the assurance of the Under Secretary of State for War that the Government intend to establish this system of reserves, but these words do not really establish as a principle of our military organisation the continuance of these. I am sorry that they do not come forward and spread the money necessary over so many years, and commit this House to a certain expenditure for so many years. [Mr. WYNDHAM signified that was the intention.] I am glad to have that principle accepted, because otherwise I should be entirely dissatisfied, and I should have little hope that after the excitement of this war is over that reserve would be sufficiently maintained. With regard to stores, equipment, and armaments, the War Office and my hon. friend deserve great credit for tackling this necessity and being prepared to deal with it, and at all events I think it indicates that it is more than probable that next year the Government intend to proceed on such lines as to define publicly the amount of stores that are to be provided. That will be extremely satisfactory. With regard to the distribution of the stores I have a word to say. You are still dealing with the question of stores as if you were an island without an empire at all. We are told that you are to have store-houses in different parts of the United Kingdom, and at one place in Ireland. I do not think it is sufficient at all to localise all your stores and supplies in the four corners of this United Kingdom. I wish to point out a most important matter. My hon. friend has shown that it would take so many years of the producing power we possess to bring up our store-houses to the standard we ought to maintain. He calculates it upon the amount required for three army corps, and the line of communication. But that is only calculated for the forces of the United Kingdom. All over the Empire, in any great war which this is supposed to be preparation for, you would have to place troops. Where are your stores to come from? You are calculating as if there was nothing outside the United Kingdom at all.

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not feel justified in going into details in this matter, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that it has been considered.

SIR J. COLOMB: I do not like to see this question treated as if we were still an island and not an Empire. A matter that must be looked in the face is the present limitation of your productive power for armaments and stores to the United Kingdom only. Has the War Office in its mind that we ought to distribute the producing power? With your great colonies and great possessions you must extend your productive power in proportion to your needs. Why is it to be bottled up in this island? If you are going to deal with the future of the Empire, you must look abroad not merely for places to store supplies, but for places to produce them. Except in India, and to a small extent in Canada, you cannot produce a cartridge outside the United Kingdom. That is an unsatisfactory position, and it is not consistent with your existence as an Empire. It is the devolution of your producing power and the distribution of your storage that in these days are most important. I for one regard the matter as one of great significance. We have heard to-day that the War Office at last is going to establish a system by which sufficient surplus stores will be maintained, but we shall not know till next year whether it will become a regular system.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I do not mean to detain the Committee more than a few minutes. I wish at once to say that, as far as I am aware, there will be no objection to the Vote of money which the right hon. Gentleman has demanded. Although it is not easy to follow in all its details the statement he made in his analysis of the military expenditure, yet I think that, on the whole, the country will be satisfied with it and with the general estimate that he has formed. He laid great stress, and very naturally, on, perhaps, the most ambitious part of his scheme, and that which was most in the way of pledging the future—namely, the forming of considerable reserve stores. I entirely agree with that policy, if it is done, of course, as he said, with discretion and wisdom. He named one or two formidable considerations that must be taken into account—first of all, the question of the perishable nature of stores, and then the question of the power of manufacture, which may vary from year to year almost in some cases. There is another point— which I think, perhaps, he includes in the term perishable—namely, change of pattern. That is a very formidable matter, and although it is very much at the discretion of the military authorities themselves, still they may themselves sometimes by their own action, and very properly and of necessity, render comparatively useless a large portion of the stores they have obtained. All these things make it by no means so easy a matter as it would seem to follow out the plan which the hon. Gentleman has sketched. But I have no doubt at all that something in that direction ought to be done. The hon. Gentleman directed our attention almost entirely to that side of the question—to the financial effect of the War Estimates that we have had laid before us, and to this question of the future reserve of stores. But what the country is more concerned about just now—I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean in that—is as to the war itself and the circumstances and events of the war. I quite appreciate that it is a difficult matter to discuss events of that kind in the House of Commons. Unfortunately, what we complain of is that we have no opportunity of discussion and, perhaps, of distinguishing ourselves by expressing very summary and badly-founded opinions regarding matters. As representatives of the nation we are at least entitled to know what the events were. In that respect I think that the House of Commons and the public at large have never been so badly informed as they have been during this war. The hon. Member, with regard to the despatches of which we have spoken so much, has been in the habit of answering questions in a way that has amazed me. He seemed to think that it was a complete answer when an hon. Member asked for the production of a certain despatch to say, “I cannot really, by an answer in this House, fetter the discretion of the Secretary of State.” But he is the Secretary of State so far as this House is concerned. He has no raison d’être here except as representing the Secretary of State. For him to say that he must reserve that for the discretion of the Secretary of State, is to say that he reserves it for his own discretion. Clearly we cannot be put off with such palpable fallacy as that. The House of Commons is entitled to have the information contained in the despatches laid before it earlier, when it is not positively prejudicial to the public service that it should be done. Something has been said as to the censorship. I think there are a great many Members of the House of Commons who want to know a little more of the censorship. I have often said, in speaking on this subject, that I recognise the necessity of closing the sources of information against our enemies, though all the censors we have had in operation have not been successful in doing that in this case. But I think we are to know who are the officers who discharge the duty of censorship, because they go very far beyond military facts and the distribution of troops. They go into matters of opinion. That is a thing which is abhorrent to the people of this country. There are other characteristics, such as the blotting out of whole sheets of a newspaper. I have seen this process applied by this so-called censorship. They were on matters of no consequence. I have known one or two cases where actual business messages have been refused for transmission on account of the censorship. The hon. Gentleman is responsible for the military censors, although he does not direct their operations, and we should like to know who they are, under what rules they act, and the nature of their instructions. We should also like to know whether it is owing to those instructions that their operations have been carried to an extent they have never been carried before, either in the Crimean War or in any other big war. In consequence of that, we are undoubtedly in a state of ignorance as to certain outstanding events in the campaign with which we ought to have been fully acquainted. Now we are told that there will be a great inquiry at the end of the war; but the worst of an inquiry at the end of a war is that all interest in it has evaporated. It was my misfortune to be a member of the Committee which inquired into the conduct of the Abyssinian War, and it was like sitting on a coroner's inquest on a man who had been dead twenty or thirty years to find out why he had died. It was very unpleasant, and the result was positively nothing. It was in every way disagreeable to the members of the Committee, and of no use whatever to the country. We were promised at the beginning of the session that there should be an inquiry. Hon. Members will recall the circumstances under which we met. We met under the cloud of certain reverses, and there was an idea that there would be a demand for an immediate inquiry into the conduct of the campaign, the generals and what not. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Address used these words—

“We wish to examine and investigate the causes of the reverses and the failures, if they may be so called, which have occurred in our campaign. I am here, perhaps, on delicate ground, but I think I may say this: we may ask ourselves with advantage whether our weakness or our failures, if I may use that word, are due to any deep-seated and inherent national weakness, or to temporary and removable causes. I think the latter can only be the answer. The Empire and the resources of the nation were never stronger than at this moment, but our power does not lie on the surface—it is deep seated; and the causes which we have to inquire into, if they are temporary and removable, must be inquired into with the view to their being removed. I feel sure that no obstacle will be thrown in the way, but that the Government will welcome inquiry in any form which may be agreeable to the House, and which will enable us to discover the causes of the difficulty and to remove them.”

The hon. Gentleman who moved the Address had not been without communication with the Government, and these are obviously words put into his hand to say, because no one would venture to say off his own bat that the Government would welcome inquiry. He does not doubt it. I have not the slightest doubt that the Government suggested he should say so. That was really and practically a promise on the part of the Government. I have other quotations here of what took place in the House of Lords on a similar occasion, but I do not think I need quote. The hon. Gentleman has assented again and again to the demand of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean that an inquiry should be made into all the circumstances which he recounted. We want to know in what way is this inquiry to be conducted. As my right hon. friend said, we do not want the military authorities out there to be worried about matters of this kind. What we complain of is want of information. If blame is to be apportioned, and if we are to have such an inquiry as will lead us to discover what the serious reverses may have been due to, what will the nature of the inquiry be? I quite agree that an inquiry will be necessary. I think it ought not to be too long delayed. I feel sure that it will be necessary, not only for the satisfaction of the public, not simply for the satisfaction of idle curiosity and the appeasement of those whose feelings have been interested in the matter; but still more—and this is much more important in the view of the House of Commons—in order that the country should know where is the weak point, or what are the weak points, and what it is we should address ourselves to rectify for the future benefit of the Army.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I hope there will be some really effective inquiry into the matters which have been referred to in the course of the debate. Of course, I do not desire, and I do not think anyone desires, that it should take the form of an inquiry by newspapers, or that it should be anything but a military inquiry; but it is prima facie right to assume that it is a disgraceful thing for British soldiers with arms in their hands to surrender. It is a presumption which may be rebutted, but until it is rebutted it exists. I think it is perhaps true that it would be a good thing if we were to come back to the spirit which certainly was much more common in the country formerly than it appears to be now. I remember the story of Admiral Calder, who sailed out of Portsmouth with a fleet of rotten ships, engaged a superior French fleet, fought them to a standstill, and took four ships. There was a court-martial, and he was severely reprimanded for not taking the whole fleet. That is a much more satisfactory spirit than the spirit in which, I fear, we have approached some of the incidents of this campaign. Although it is rather presumptuous for anyone here to express opinions as to the merits and demerits of men who are risking their lives, I think it is a fair and reasonable thing in the interest of the British Army, whose reputation for bravery is so splendid and so high, that there should be an inquiry—not an inquiry into everything in general and nothing in particular, but a definite and specific inquiry into the surrenders which have taken place. I accept the assurance in the fullest way of my hon. friend that such an inquiry will be held, and that it will be effective. I accept also with the greatest satisfaction the statement of my hon. friend that we are to have a great reconstruction of the system of supplying stores for the Army. I confess that I wish the House of Commons in its majesty was more largely represented than it is at the present moment. I think it is rather unfortunate that there should be such small interest taken in what ought to be the most important discussion of military matters of the present year, because I think, unless the country understands how important the statement made by the Under Secretary is, it will very much miss the lesson it ought to learn. I think it is fair that we should ask for a little more than the assurance that has been given. We want some security as to the nature of the reforms to be made, and I think I can give some evidence which warrants me in feeling some doubt on the subject. The question of stores is not a new one at all. On 12th February, this year, Lord Lansdowne, speaking on this question in the House of Lords, said—

“My Lords, among our other proposals now being carried out is one dealing with the question of the stores and munitions of war of all kinds. As to that, I do not think I need say any more than that we have adopted it for our policy not only to replace the large inroads which have been made upon our stores of all sorts, but also to build up the reserves upon a much ampler scale than has hitherto been authorised. We have been struck by the inadequacy of our reserves of stores, and we are determined that we shall no longer be open to that reproach.”

That is a very serious statement. This deficiency may have been a new fact to the Secretary of State, but I will undertake to say that it was not a new fact to any one of us. It has been a perfectly notorious fact inside and outside the House for many years past, and I say that when we are told merely that this policy is to be reversed, we require more details in order to make us perfectly happy. It appears to me inexplicable that the Secretary of State, after six years of office, should be allowed without protest to get up and make a statement of that kind in the House of Lords. It appears to me intolerable that a great State servant, speaking in regard to a matter respecting which the country has entrusted him with absolute power, should, after six years of office, get up and say, “We have been struck by the inadequacy of our reserves of stores.” What is the deficiency? My hon. friend talks about £6,500,000. I venture to think that even this does not represent the whole measure of neglect. Let us turn that deficiency into what the money is going to buy. It represents a deficiency of nearly 600 guns alone, and nothing, so far as I am aware, has happened in the last year, or the last few months, which has altered the situation with regard to the necessity for guns except what was known beforehand must happen, and what has been proved to demonstration by the progress of the war. We are told that we are to have other great changes. We are told that the Militia is to be put on a better footing. We have all been hoping for that for a long time, but what guarantee have we? I find that the Secretary of State for War, speaking of the Militia in the House of Lords on 20th February said—

“The Militia is below its establishment, and nobody regrets it more than I do. But it has been more or less below its establishment for many years past. We are no worse in that respect than we were last year or the year before."

For six years past the Secretary of State, it appears, has been regretting that the Militia is 30,000 below its strength. This is not a new thing. What has he done? Nothing, absolutely nothing, during that time to amend the error he so greatly deplores. I think we want something more than an assurance, because what has turned this regret into an active policy has been not conviction or intelligence, but simply the pressure of this war. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for War was recently attacked in the House of Lords for allowing filthy clothing to be supplied to the Militia. This seems, perhaps, to be a matter of detail not bearing on any great principle, but it is an example of what is done. The facts were represented to him by the Duke of Bedford, and the Secretary of State said—

"Then we come to the delicate question of Militia clothing. I am not surprised that the statement made by the noble Duke produced a very considerable impression upon your Lordships, and I must say that if it were to be shown to be the case that worn clothing, dirty and disreputable in its character, was re-issued to the Militia, I do not think the language used by the noble Duke was at all too strong. I should be very glad to have any allegations that he brings to my notice thoroughly gone into."

These allegations were inquired into, and a few days later we are told—

"I come to the question of the clothing of the Militia. I promised the Duke of Bedford that I would make inquiry into the subject, and I admit that, as a result of the inquiries I have made, I am satisfied that in the matter of clothing we have allowed what I suppose I might call considerations of frugality to prevail rather too much, and that clothing has been issued to the Militia which one could scarcely ask a British soldier to wear without some injury to his feelings of self-respect. Action will be taken without loss of time to remedy that grievance, and I will undertake that in the future clothing shall be issued to the force which shall make it impossible for any colonel to make such a complaint as that which was made by the noble Duke the other evening."

What is the lesson to be drawn from this? The complaint has been made by many other Militia colonels. Why is the matter now remedied? Because the Militia is brought under the public eye and because this demand was made in the House of Lords by a noble Duke. This example is one of scores in which the antiquated and unsatisfactory nature of the Militia clothing has been insisted upon in season and out of season, and yet the Secretary of State for War has done nothing to remedy the state of things which he now admits is incompatible with the British soldier having any proper feeling of self respect. Yet the noble Lord has been in office for the last six years, and has had the power to alter all this, but not a hand's-turn has he done to remedy these defects. A good many of us have deplored the fearful waste of the present system of the Army, and, apparently, we have not been alone in doing so. Upon the 25th May the Secretary for War also deplored it. He said in another place—

"To my mind one of the greatest drawbacks in our present system is to be found in the fact that of the men who do enter the Army so large a number waste away and disappear in the first years of their service, giving us neither the full period of their service with the colours nor the advantage of their presence afterwards in the Reserve."

That is a doctrine which has been preached in season and out of season for the last five years, but it has had not the slightest effect. No notice has been taken in this House, but now it is admitted that it is one of the greatest evils of the present system, by the Secretary for War. Let me give yet one more example of the extraordinary attitude of this great official who is established in his office to carry out the plain duty of spending the millions entrusted to him to procure the best defence for the country. He was asked the other day by the Duke of Bedford how it was we had so many soldiers at home who were useless. He said—

"I told the House that we had about 100,000 Regular soldiers left in this country, and he said, 'Why is it if you have so many Regulars at home that you are obliged to fall back upon the Militia, and to send out Militia battalions to South Africa?' I think the answer is obvious, and that from the tenor of the noble Duke's remarks, he knows what the answer is. These men—they now number not 100,000 but 92,000—are, of course, in no sense a field army."

Have we been paying millions in order to have in this country 92,000 men who are in no sense a field army? These men are perfectly useless—they are provided with neither guns, stores, nor clothing; it is all quite true. But why should we be told we have a large number of men in this country so useless that we have to fall back upon the Militia? These are samples of the way in which these duties are performed, or rather left unperformed. In any other business but the great business of the State a declaration of that kind, after a long period of service, by the head of a great department would have resulted in some other head being sought for and put in his place. I am unable to comprehend how a Minister can get up in the House of Lords and make such statements as if they were quite the ordinary thing to say and could not possibly be objected to? I do not blame Lord Lansdowne only. None of the Secretaries for War of recent years have taken their duties seriously, and until we change the whole attitude of the War Office by some drastic reform, I must treat the promises made this evening as having no value beyond mere expression of good intentions. There is one special matter which indicates the necessity for giving effect to a reform of the War Office of a sweeping character. When we consider the dangers that threaten us in every part of the world, the problems we have to face, and the lessons we have learnt, or might have learnt, from the present war in South Africa, it is positively dreadful to remember that there is no Department of State—no organised Department—in the country to which is entrusted the duty of organising the defence of this country. I challenge anyone to contradict my statement, and I say there could not be a more serious state of things for this country. The protection of the Empire by land and sea is a problem far more difficult than that which confronts the War Office of any other country in the world. It is a problem peculiar to our Empire, and being peculiar it requires special study. But who is charged to deal with it? The Intelligence Department is a small, underpaid, and undermanned Department; in no sense does it pretend to be an organised Department for the defence of the Empire. There is no co-ordination at all between the different Departments for the defence of the Empire. The hon. and gallant Member for Great Yarmouth said something about the desirability of getting some uniformity in the supply of stores, and my hon. friend said the Indian stores were already complete. Take the Indian stores. Only this session we had proof of the failure of one point of contact between the Indian War Office and our own. And this may lead to the most disastrous results. I was told that the Indian Government and the War Office were unable to come to terms. I asked a question, and the answer given was so illusory and absurd that I almost wonder that it was given at all. It was a question as to the pattern of some gun. There were two sets of guns made of different patterns, not because it was desirable to have two different kinds, but simply because one strong man said he must have a 5·4 howitzer, and another strong man said he must have a 5-inch, and there was no Department to compel these men to agree. With regard to Imperial defence. One sham creates another, and this appears to be so with regard to the Committee of the Cabinet for Defence. That Committee, we are told, never keeps minutes. Why? Because, forsooth, it is a Committee of the Cabinet. The Cabinet itself is a constitutional fiction, and this Committee in its turn is a fiction also. Any person that wrote a book on the subject would have to say—"The only body charged with the defence of the Empire is composed of the head of the Education Department, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the First Lord of the Treasury, the Secretary of State for War, and the First Lord of the Admiralty, and this body, which is alone charged with the great duty of organising the defence of the Empire, can get through this enormous work, in addition to all its other business, without going through the formality which a lodge of Oddfellows would go through, and which every company does go through. It does not keep minutes of its proceedings." I believe that my hon. friend will endeavour, so far as he is concerned, to carry out the promises which he has made, but I fear he will not be able to accomplish half that he promises. Until we have a proper organisation for the defence of the Empire, promises to do what is the primary business of any War Office are of no great value. Some system ought to be introduced which will not leave us open to a repetition of these painful demands on the part of the Secretary of State for War, who has been compelled to acknowledge, after a long period of peace, that he has failed during that period to do any of the things which he now declares to be essential.

*SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I see a considerable amount of money is being devoted to the medical establishment and to pay and materials for strengthening the medical department of the Army. That is a question very much in the mind of the public just now, and I hope before the conclusion of the debate we shall have some detailed statement as to how this money is to be applied, what improvement is to be made in the Army Medical Corps, and how it is proposed to reinforce the medical department in South Africa. At the present time the medical department in South Africa is composed of two sections of medical men—the Royal Army Medical Corps and civil surgeons. With regard to the civil surgeons who have been sent out, I think the War Office to some extent was limited somewhat unwisely in its choice. There was an age limit which was not altogether wisely chosen, by which many valuable practitioners and experienced men were debarred from the duty, for, after all, it was men of established experience who were wanted rather than men fresh from the hospitals who might know more of surgery but less of medicine. We have sent out to South Africa many men of considerable ability and distinction, but I think the War Office would have been better advised if they had widened their area of choice, and selected men of greater age and experience than many who have been sent out. With regard to the Royal Army Medical Corps, the hon. Member will be obliged to confess that the strength of that corps is at present dangerously low. I said in a previous debate that it was dangerously low even for a peace establishment, and at the present time it is only about 900 strong. There ought to be considerably more than that. About fifteen or twenty years back there were 1,200 medical men in the corps, but now it is down to 900. The Royal Army Medical Corps is so diminished in numbers, and the force is so starved as regards medical equipment that if we sent out a division, or a part of a division, to China, and a German division of the same strength was sent out, it would be found that the German division had probably 50 per cent. more medical strength than our division. That is a condition of things discreditable to the country. The country has shown the greatest generosity both in voting supplies in this House and in giving freely of its private funds for the purpose of seeing that the men who went to fight for the Empire were well treated. The men have not been as well treated as they deserved; we have lost many hundreds of brave fellows through the want of proper medical appliances, and I am anxious that the money which is voted to-day should be applied in a direction which will ensure for these men more attention than they have hitherto received. I should like the hon. Member to tell us how much of this Vote as regards medical matters is to be devoted to China, and how much to South Africa. In China we have a great danger before us, just as we had in connection with the South African campaign. Everybody who knew anything about South Africa knew that almost every village in which the troops might be stationed or kept for a few days was liable to typhoid fever, and yet adequate preparation to meet that danger was not made. When we send our troops to China we shall have there a danger even more serious and loathsome than enteric or typhoid—namely, the danger of the plague. Our troops in China will be exposed to sanitary dangers of the gravest kind, and I hope the War Office will be wise enough to take some precautions against an outbreak of such a serious disease, or at all events to minimise the danger as much as possible. I should also like to know what is proposed in regard to increasing the number of nurses in connection with the Army Medical Department. I think the rigid rules regulating the number of female nurses in connection with that Department are unwise; they ought to be more elastic; the whole constitution of the Department should be more elastic. When you have a campaign in a country where you are liable to a lingering malady such as enteric fever, which, above all maladies, requires the delicate and constant attention of female nurses, we ought to have some means by which there could be a much larger number connected with the Army Medical Department. Enteric is a disease which is not only grave in its incidence, killing at least one-fifth of those attacked, but it disables even those who get over it for about three months. That is a terrible strain on the fighting force of our Army, and going on as it has been in South Africa with thousands and thousands of cases, and in almost every place occupied, we ought to have such nursing at hand that the men may make as quick and as speedy a recovery as possible. It would be very advisable to institute some system by which we could have a reserve Army Medical Corps in this country for the purposes of a war such as we are now engaged in. It would not be difficult, I think, to get a large number of young medical men who would be ready under easy conditions to accept service in case of national necessity. You might get, possibly, many hundreds of the pick of our medical schools enrolled under some system by which the War Office would be able to call upon them in time of necessity, and that would be much better than looking for a surgeon here and a surgeon there in various parts of the country when the time of stress came. Then there is another point. I believe that in all these matters prevention is better than cure, and that when an army goes into the field the means of preventing disease are much more important than the means of treating it. In the case of the present war the War Office reinforced the Army Medical Department with operating surgeons. That was a wise step, which was generally approved; but they would have taken a still wiser step if they had reinforced the Department with a number of physicians in the same way. There was more necessity for such men under the conditions of disease which exist in South Africa, and the department would have been greatly helped by the experience of men who had been attached to the fever hospitals of this country. More attention should be paid to the sanitary aspects of a campaign. It is true that the military medical officers are trained more or less in sanitary science; it is true that some of the best text-books on the subject have been written by Army medical officers. But in spite of that, judging from the results of this campaign, we cannot consider that their efforts as sanitary experts have been satisfactory. We have had disclosures as to the treatment of the sick; we have had evidence as to the outbreaks of great epidemics of typhoid fever, which might have been lessened and many lives saved if wiser sanitary arrangements had been made. I am told on the authority of friends of mine who have been through this campaign, that over and over again troops marching to the front have been allowed to camp on ground which has been left by previous detachments and fouled very often by serious disease, such as typhoid fever. The consequence is that body after body of men have come under conditions which made disease rife among the troops. These things would have been prevented if you had wise sanitary supervision along the line of march. I want to have sanitary supervision not going ahead of, but with the Army. I am sure if the hon. Gentleman can see his way to carry out the suggestions I have made he will do something to preserve the lives of many of the Queen's best subjects, and he will give the country the great satisfaction of knowing that the brave sons who are sent out to fight its battles are not to be lost by the neglect of such scientific precautions as ought to be at the command of every medical officer in the country.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): I rise to say a few words on the subject to which the hon. Member has just addressed himself, but I should like first to refer to the censorship. No one can realise better than I do the necessity of striking out from correspondence or telegrams anything that could in any way affect the strategic or military interests of the Army, but I do not think that those limits include statements with regard to the condition of the sick and wounded. A short time ago there was a facsimile of a despatch from a correspondent published in a morning paper, and several sentences which he had inserted with regard to the unhappy condition of the wounded were deliberately obliterated by the censor. I know another case in which a long despatch was written on the same subject, and the whole of that letter was censored. A somewhat amusing incident happened to me out there. A telegram was sent to me—a domestic telegram—written in Italian, and containing some such phrase as "tempo magnifico" or "dolce giorno." It was detained twenty-four hours while the censor was endeavouring to find out what horrid foreign plot was being hatched. May I point out what I think is a great mistake with regard to the censor. The same official who censors despatches has the whole control of the movements of the correspondents. He controls their passes, can give them orders, tell them where they can go, how long they can stay, and altogether exercise the most draconic authority over them. The two offices ought to be separate; the striking out of what is not considered proper in a despatch should be done by one person, and the movements of correspondents controlled by another. If that were done there could be no suggestion of a correspondent being prejudiced by anything he had put in a telegram. Moreover, the censor should be a military man. My own experience is that when civilians get into khaki they out-Herod Herod in militarism. They are the counterparts of the gentlemen who stay at home and indulge in vicarious heroism, and who think they are very brave when they say that the British soldier ought to endure every possible hardship whether it is avoidable or not. I listened to the very able speech of the Under Secretary of State for War, and I noticed that in his division of this money into expenditure for immediate and for permanent purposes he did not give any information about this very large additional Vote for the Army Medical Department. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean referred to the cutting down of the transport of the Royal Army Medical Corps, but I think the real point is that the Department does not possess any transport of its own, and without transport of its own it never knows what it can do, what it will be able to do, and is never able to make proper preparation for pressure in this place or that. I would venture to illustrate this fact by the very remarkable service that has been performed in this campaign by the medical units which had their own transport. One was the private hospital known as the Irish hospital. Owing to having its own transport that hospital was of the greatest possible service; at Bloemfontein it supplied nearly the whole of the transport, and the ambulance wagons and mules were constantly at work for the Government hospitals and the town and field hospitals. A still more remarkable case was that of the New South Wales field hospital and bearer company, which was found to be so efficient and so valuable that it was broken up from time to time into three or four units, and was looked to in every emergency. One of its great advantages was that it had its own transport, and consequently was always ready to go where it was wanted, and to do work which other medical units were unable to do. With regard to these extra stores, I think it is legitimate to ask what proportion of them are to be medical stores. The Committee may not quite understand the position of the Army Medical Department or the Royal Army Medical Corps in a campaign in this respect. The Royal Army Medical Corps possesses nothing of its own except medicines and drugs. It has to draw the whole of its transport, food supplies, and so on from the Army Service Corps and the whole of its equipment from the Ordnance Department. It would be interesting, therefore, to know whether the necessary equipment for the Royal Army Medical Corps forms a part of these extra ordnance stores. I do not myself think that the difficulties and the, to my mind, disastrous results which have arisen in South Africa in connection with the medical service have been caused so much by an absence of equipment as by an absence of men. Everybody who has been out there—every consulting surgeon and other authority—has called attention to the fact that the Royal Army Medical Corps has been fatally undermanned. To that fact has been owing the circumstance that great numbers of the sick could not get proper attention. The service has been undermanned in doctors, in orderlies, and in nurses. It is, therefore, fair to ask whether anything is to be done with the portion of this Vote which is for permanent purposes, to secure a better state of things for the future in the Army Medical Department. Although I realise that the Army Medical Department is too small, I do not make so much of that. I quite realise that it is perfectly impossible to maintain in time of peace an Army Medical Department equal to the strain of a great war, and, therefore, you must have some system whereby you can at any moment, when occasion arises, call for skilled aid, whether it be of doctors, orderlies, or nurses. My great complaint has been that there is no such system in the Department at all; there is no system of reserve; there is no effective system of an auxiliary medical force attached to the Militia or to the Volunteers, although there is a small beginning of a Militia medical system. In this connection I would like again to refer to the New South Wales field hospital. That magnificent medical unit, so splendidly equipped and disciplined, and able to meet the greatest emergencies at the front, was composed entirely of civilians. Some of the most famous Australian doctors gave their services voluntarily, giving up the large incomes they were deriving from their practices in order to serve in the field. It seems to me that if a medical service of that kind could be established through the machinery of the Militia, with a month's training and field days now and again, that would be a model upon which might be based a very effective improvement of the Army Medical Department. There is no practical elasticity about the Department. Putting aside the question of the Militia and the Volunteers, they have no system by which they can call upon carefully selected medical men for the purpose of sending them out to a campaign. As to orderlies, I think it would be very difficult for any system to create a sufficient number of nursing orderlies to meet the needs of a great war. There are the St. John Ambulance orderlies, and very admirable work they have done in this campaign. But it must be remembered that they have no practical training of any kind, and the general opinion in the Army Medical Department is that it takes at least six weeks to accustom even a theoretically trained St. John Ambulance man to the efficient handling of a patient. I have heard Army medical officers say that it takes three years to train a nursing orderly properly. No system of theoretically trained orderlies will supply what you want in time of war. What is the alternative? If you cannot keep a large number of men nurses in time of peace ready and sufficiently skilled to go out to a war, you have always at your disposal female nurses all over the country, and one of my great complaints has been that, starting from a theoretical and very obstinate objection to female nurses in the Department at home, there has not been anything like a sufficient supply of nurses to meet the cases of sickness and enteric fever. I think that objection in the Army Medical Department at home ought to be erased. We ought to accept at once, in any campaign carried on in a civilised country such as South Africa, where women are respected in every way, the principle of having a very large number of female nurses certainly at the base and stationary hospitals. The Boers themselves have female nurses in their field hospitals, and very admirable nurses they seemed. I do not, however, insist on female nurses going with field hospitals, but I do think they ought to be with field hospitals when they become stationary hospitals. The lack of elasticity in the system can be best illustrated by looking for a moment at one of the base hospitals at Cape Town. Military base hospitals are very admirable institutions, but it must be remembered that each one has a staff of 166 men, including doctors. These base hospitals are strategically safe. If there was any elasticity in the working of the system, when the pressure came the whole of the staff of a base hospital could be pushed up to the front where they are most needed, being trained men—Army medical surgeons, trained orderlies, men belonging to the military contingent—and their places could be supplied by putting in their tents a completely civilian institution. There would have to be two or three officers and a small staff at the head to keep up communications with the military authorities, but all that concerned the medical and surgical treatment of the patients could be done as well by a civil as by a military staff. I might illustrate the point further by referring to the private hospitals sent out to South Africa. There were eight or nine such hospitals, and each, with the exception of one Army medical officer to keep up their connection with the military system and to send in the returns, was a purely civil institution. Would it not be as possible for the Army Medical Department as for private persons to create and to send out a civil institution such as that? I have ventured to make these few remarks to the Committee to indicate the line which I think the expenditure of money now to be voted for permanent as distinguished from immediate purposes should take, and I think I may be pardoned for urging upon the Committee some improvements of the system which would, at all events, result in having at the seat of war a sufficient personnel to avoid much of such suffering as has occurred in the present campaign.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I regret we have not had some definite announcement as to the steps the Secretary of State proposes to take in order to profit by the lessons of the war. I understood the Under Secretary to say it was premature to do anything of the kind until Lord Roberts, Lord Kitchener, and other generals came home. A very large number of officers are coming home now, and it is perfectly certain that Lord Roberts has written full despatches on many of the incidents of the war, and there are many facts concerning the campaign which are absolutely well known. The teaching on those points could perfectly well be put into operation. I very much hoped that a Committee would be appointed to receive suggestions from all arms taking part in the campaign, without distinction of rank. It would be a large business, but it would not be difficult to tabulate evidence of that character, and some very important testimony might possibly be forthcoming. If such a Committee could be under a civilian chairman it would perhaps be better, so long as every arm was represented on the body. There are one or two matters about which I think we ought to lose no time. I was disappointed at not hearing any definite announcement as to the better provision of field guns. It is perfectly certain that in several cases our artillery has been outranged, and the sooner our field artillery is put upon the very latest modern system the better for the country. Then as to the armament of the infantry. There can be very little doubt that in many ways the Mauser rifle is the superior of the Lee-Metford. To take one point alone, the Boer rifle is superior with regard to the way in which the magazine is charged. The whole of the five cartridges are put in at once with one clip, while there is nothing more difficult to the inexperienced soldier, especially in the heat of action, than to load the magazine of the Lee-Metford rifle. Then as regards musketry training. Are we profiting by the musketry and shooting lessons of the war? We already have another war on our hands, and what is the use of delay in this matter? There is ample evidence now forthcoming as to many of the defective points in our musketry training. The National Rifle Association is not connected with the Government, but only last week they had competitions for standing at 200 or 300 yards—as if there was the slightest possibility of standing in the face of an enemy at that distance! Then again, there is the practice of the Army at the present time. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, who made a most interesting and moderate speech, with a great deal, if not the whole, of which I entirely agree, doubted whether the training at the present time at Aldershot had been improved at all by the lessons taught by the war in South Africa. To take musketry alone; nothing is more certain than that firing by volleys is absolutely ineffectual. The rifles are discharged at word of command, and the object is to have spontaneity of noise rather than accuracy of shooting. That practice is actually continuing at the present moment. It is perfectly impossible for expert marksmen to fire accurately at word of command. With every desire to give all credit to the War Office—and no one is more anxious than Lord Lansdowne to do everything possible to improve the Army—I really do not see any substantial evidence that any of the lessons of the war are being put into effect at the present time. The right hon. Baronet spoke about entrenchments. At Aldershot there is one wretched field, a sort of rubbish field, to which the battalions are supposed to go in turn, if there is room for them, to learn how to throw up a trench. That is not proper instruction of any sort or kind. I am quite aware there have been difficulties. Government land is limited, and even on Government land there are many restrictions designed rather to improve the beauty and character of the country than to effect an improvement in military training. There can be no doubt whatever that at Spion Kop our troops were hopelessly out-matched by the Boers in the matter of entrenchments. They find themselves really without instructions and without proper tools for entrenching. If you take the present drill-book you will find plates illustrating shelter trenches in which the soldier is represented as showing the whole of his head, his shoulders, and the greater part of his body over the top. It is perfectly obvious that if you show the smallest tip of your head, the probability is that you will be shot. I see very little, if any, instruction in the important matter of entrenching being carried out. The same applies to scouting. I know that instruction in scouting requires a great area of country. The Germans can have much better training in scouting because they have much larger areas to go over, and in case of damage to private property they pay only nominal compensation. I know there is considerable difficulty in the matter, but the one complaint from every general in South Africa, from Sir Redvers Buller downwards, has been about the scouting. There is no necessity to wait for the return of Lord Roberts in the matter of cavalry and mounted infantry training in regard to scouting. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean not to place too much confidence in what German writers say about the conduct of the war in South Africa.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I fully admitted that they were written with prejudice, except in the case of Generals von Blume and von der Goltz.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: The information of these German writers has been largely derived from the Boers, and therefore, as the hon. Baronet admits, it comes from prejudiced sources. No German officers have ever had to conduct a campaign in so difficult and vast a country as South Africa, and it is almost impossible for them to form any idea of the extraordinary military difficulties which had to be faced. Therefore, we should not pay much attention to theoretical military criticism from Berlin, and from people not acquainted with the local conditions. I am quite sure that—with all respect to the German writers—the right hon. Baronet will be the first to admit that the majority of those writers have never seen any active service at all, and therefore their statements must be taken with a very large grain of salt. I earnestly press upon my hon. friend the necessity of making reforms in the training of the British soldiers, and those reforms should be instituted at once. When the war is over we must profit by the lessons of this war, and we know perfectly well that unless these things are done at once they never will be done at all. I cannot resume my seat without saying a word or two as regards the censorship. I should not be at all surprised if the newspaper correspondents said they had suffered from the censorship. I know something about this question in foreign campaigns, and perhaps the best censorship I ever knew was by the Russian army in the advance upon Turkey in 1877. The censors there were people of considerable experience, and they were always to be found in their office. You could always find them when you wanted them, and there was no difficulty about it. In South Africa, no doubt, the censors have been constantly changed, and whenever anybody wanted something to do, and there was nothing particular to give him, they made him a press censor. I know of one case where the newspaper correspondents were put to considerable inconvenience by the censor never being in his office when he had said he would be there in order to revise telegrams. I think the hon. Member for Westminster was a little in error in saying that there was any censorship of letters.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: Yes, there was.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Private or newspaper letters?

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: Newspaper letters.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I know that when Lord Roberts got out to South Africa he sent for the newspaper correspondents, and he said to them, practically, "Write what you like, because it is by your writings that I shall see what mistakes have been made." The relations between Lord Roberts and the newspaper correspondents have always been of the most cordial description. If there has been any censorship of newspaper letters I have not heard of them, and I know that there has been very free criticism in many of the letters sent by the newspaper correspondents for the Daily Telegraph, The Times, and other papers. As for the censorship of private letters or telegrams, I never heard of it while I was out in South Africa. You can understand such telegrams as those to which my hon. friend the Member for Westminster alluded being delayed, because that was obviously a cypher telegram.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: No, no.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: The telegraph office were justified in assuming that it was, at any rate.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: It was a telegram in very simple and elementary Italian.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: It was in a foreign language, and that is perhaps why there was delay in sending it off. I want to ask one other question. The Under Secretary will remember that when the last Estimates were on a wish was expressed by hon. Members on both this and the other side of the House that greater mobility should be given to the regiments at home. My hon. friend expressed great sympathy in the matter, and he said it was perfectly absurd that there should be such an enormous amount of baggage when the regiments were moved from one station to another. I see that there is £100,000 in this Supplementary Estimate for transport in the United Kingdom. I hope the hon. Gentleman will be able to tell us now that he has translated his sympathy into actual practice, and that something is being done. How necessary it is that this should be done no one knows better than the hon. Gentleman himself. The heavy cost of transfer from one command to another frequently prevents the most able general being sent to a particular district. To take over the Aldershot command costs something like £3,000. That is a scandalous thing, and it is clear that a general may be admirably fitted to train troops up to modern requirements, and yet he may not have the £3,000 which is necessary to furnish Government House at Aldershot, and to incur the heavy initial expense of taking up that command. If a general has just installed himself in a house at the cost of £3,000, if he has had to furnish it from top to bottom, naturally he is unwilling to be transferred to some other sphere of activity, and he has some just ground for complaint if the Government desire to transfer him to another station. I will not trouble the Committee further, but I hope my hon. friend in his reply will give some definite assurances that the lessons of this war will be taken to heart by the War Office and enforced throughout the Army.

MR. WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): Most hon. Members who have spoken have dealt with the question of medical stores in the Army and with munitions of war. I wish to press upon the Under Secretary a question which, in my opinion, is quite as material as either good weapons or good medical equipment, and that is the proper feeding of our troops. I have to-day received two letters, but I shall not weary the Committee with reading the whole of them. They are from men at the front who are unknown to me, but they show that the troops have not been well looked after, and if they had had proper commissariat we should not have had the same amount of sickness. One of these letters is from a constituent of mine, whose son wrote to him as follows—door to door in some towns asking and begging for bread, and been thankful for a dry crust. I have gone for weeks on end with only one biscuit a day, sometimes without even that."

The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary will recognise that these letters are at his disposal if he wishes to see them. The other letter is somewhat of the same nature and is to this effect—

"For the last month weariness and hunger have been the only sensations we have been capable of unless it is a surly dogged determination to see the thing through, which has helped our men along on their dreary foot-sore tramp, and has kept them in the ranks when sickness and fatigue would otherwise have forced them to fall out in sheer despair. It has been want of food that has been the heaviest burden we have had to bear. We were hungry after we left Winburg; we were hungrier still when we reached Kroonstad; but from Linley to Johannesburg we have been hungriest of all. For months we have had no bread, for many days no biscuit, and for the last few days before the battle of Florida Heights we have received no bread rations at all save a pinch or two per man of coarse ground mealie, which will not make dough, but can only be boiled into a gritty, tasteless, indigestible porridge."

I do not propose to read these letters at any greater length. Of course, nobody expects that, in a campaign such as we have been engaged in, the troops will not have to undergo some hardships, but I do say that if, instead of giving out this dough and flour, they had given oatmeal it would have had very excellent effects. If this had been done I think the health of our troops would have been far better than it has been through this campaign. I could have given many other instances, but I will refrain at present from giving any more extracts from letters which have reached me. I have received letters from quite independent sources in which they say that our troops have been half starved. If the troops had had oatmeal instead of this queer mealy stuff there would not have been the same necessity for the strain upon the Royal Army Medical Corps. I do hope the hon. Member the Under Secretary, who always listens with courtesy to any suggestions which are made, will see that sufficient oatmeal is sent out to South Africa to supply the troops.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said he should like to say one word in regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member opposite. He had given many details in regard to the hardships which the troops had undergone, but he thought it would be found on investigation that many of those hardships were due to the unfortunate capture of convoys by the enemy. They all knew that in war such accidents would happen, and he did not think anybody would complain seriously of matters like that, which were purely the incidents of war. He thought they would be wasting the time of the Committee considering hardships which were inevitable, although if they were preventible and someone had blundered it would be a different matter. There must be minute inquiry into many of the incidents of this war. There was a general opinion that there had been many failures and much unnecessary loss of life in some of the initial stages of the campaign; indeed, it was difficult to understand how men high in authority, who had previous experience of war in South Africa, could have made certain recommendations as to the constitution of the force to be employed which surprised people less well informed. Those were matters which would no doubt be inquired into. It was impossible to imagine that earnest men in charge at the War Office would not take to heart the lessons of the war. He confessed that he could not share the words of depreciation thrown out against those charged with the heavy responsibility of this war. In the case of men like the Secretary of State for War, who had gained a high reputation in other very important positions, those charges would have belied his former history. He ventured to say that there had never been anyone in office in this country who had been more painstaking, more earnest, and more ready to hear suggestions from all quarters than the present Secretary of State for War. He believed his courage was equal to his patience and skill, and if they only considered how much had been accomplished by the War Office he thought they would be more inclined to make allowance for any shortcomings. At the same time he agreed with those who urged that their system must be largely remodelled, and that the country must be better prepared in the future for great emergencies than they had been in the past. It would never do for them again to send men out so hurriedly, and put them in uniform with arms which they did not know how to use. They should be better prepared in the future, and the lessons of this war must be taken to heart. With regard to the Army Medical Department, there could be no doubt that they had been short-handed. His hon.

friend who represented the War Office had acknowledged that they had been short-handed, but it was to a large extent only for a time. Not only had they been short-handed, but the doctors had not been in the places where they would have been most useful, and there never was a time when the great change made in the composition of the Army Medical Department some years ago had been more clearly proved to be a mistake. Under the old system the medical officers used to gain a thorough knowledge of the regiments to which they were attached, and they knew exactly the requirements and the character of the men they had to deal with. It was only natural that medical men who were moved about from one regiment to another, who were here to-day and gone to-morrow, could never gain a thorough knowledge of the requirements of the regiments to which they were attached. That change was made in what had been described as the halcyon days when the Estimates were lower and when everything was pared down closely. He remembered the time when a saving on the Army Estimates was made at the last minute by reducing every company by ten men, but as the regiments were not up to establishment it only made a difference on paper. At the time many of them argued against this change in the composition of the Army Medical Department, and he did not believe there was a medical officer in the Army at the present time who would not say that the change was very much to be regretted. He had never met an officer who had anything to say in favour of this change; and what could be expected in the case of a regiment who went out on active service with medical men who had only lately joined them? He had very good reason to believe that very often some of the most necessary appliances in field hospitals were wanting, because the medical officers in charge of them were afraid to speak out. He had good reason to think that very often the deficiency in articles of the first necessity was due to the fact that the medical officers themselves knew that they would make themselves unpopular with their superior officers if they pressed for those articles. That would not be so if the medical officers had a settled position from which they could not be displaced except for some grave failure in their duty. He thought if the

Sir J. Ferguson.

Inquiry to be held went deeply into this question, and if the medical officers engaged came forward and stated what they thought, he was sure it would be found that this was a weak spot in the Army Medical Department which would have to be obviated. No doubt to a great extent the Army Medical Department was on its trial in South Africa, and he should be surprised if it did not come out of it successfully, because it was largely composed of men who were anxious to do their duty, and who were ready to devote themselves at any sacrifice to carry out their work as well as they could. He believed that in nothing which Lord Lansdowne had done had he shown more wisdom than in the raising of the character of the Army Medical Department. No doubt the question would be dealt with courageously after this lamentable war had closed, and no pains would be spared to remedy those faults so that in time to come their gallant soldiers would have to suffer less than they had done in this campaign.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said he agreed with a good deal of what the hon. Member who had just sat down had said. As one who had served in the Army, he knew the ties which previously existed between the doctor and his regiment. Nevertheless, he concurred with the present arrangement because he thought it had been found that the old plan was quite unworkable under present modes of warfare, and the short service system rendered the old methods not so necessary. A doctor in the Army used to be expected to know exactly the constitutions of his patients, and he used to know who were the malingerers. Lord Lansdowne had raised the status of the Army Medical Corps by giving them their proper Army rank, and what had just been said bore that out. There was an impression that a simple doctor would not get such good terms for the men under his control as he would if he were a major or a captain; that if he had his proper rank he would get better terms in the field from the transport. He was in accord with the hon. Member for Westminster to some extent. The hon. Gentleman called attention to the starvation of the Army Medical Department. Those who had followed the debates in the House would be aware of the way in which the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean, the hon. Member for West Belfast, and himself had, over and over again, pointed out the paucity of the ranks. When it was proposed to send out two army corps, it was pointed out there was not sufficient medical service for one. A good deal had been said as to the deficiency of nurses, but the hon. Member for Westminster did not give sufficient credit to the male nursing. Those male nurses might not be so well up in scientific nursing as female nurses, but there was a sense of comradeship between them and their patients, many of whom would prefer their ministrations to those of a trained female nurse.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS said he had no desire to discuss the respective merits of male and female nursing; all he said was that in war time if nurses were required they must be female nurses, because no large supply of male nurses would be available.

DR. FARQUHARSON said there should be a larger reserve of medical officers. He was not quite satisfied with the answer of the Under Secretary a few days previously, in which he said a large number of well-trained men had been employed in this campaign.

MR. WYNDHAM: Everyone who has volunteered has been sent to the front.

DR. FARQUHARSON said in that case his observations were not to the point. He concurred with the hon. Member for Westminster as to the necessity of an independent transport for the Army Medical Department; it was well known that during all these great campaigns the exigencies of the military purposes were given first place so far as transport was concerned, and he hoped that one result of the inquiry would be to lay down a principle of some arrangement of this kind. He wished to know whether anything was going to be done at the end of the war with regard to the Indian Bearer Fund. He could not admit, as the hon. Member for Westminster had stated, that the results of the campaign were disastrous. No doubt it was sad to see men suffering from enteric fever lying on the ground, but the results of the campaign were admirable when one considered that there was only 20 or 21 per cent. of deaths as against 17 per cent. in civil life.

*COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, Ince) said one thing which those interested in this matter ought to know was what the Army was formed for. The Army was organised by Lord Cardwell to send 60,000 men abroad, yet in the case of this war we had sent more than three times that number, and had had to find supplies for more than four times the number. Had any Continental nation been subjected to the same difficulties they would not have been able to meet them in the way in which our Army had met many of the difficulties of this campaign. When the whole conduct of the war was inquired into it would be found that the War Office would come out far better than many others who had had to deal with the question. The organisation for sending out troops had worked so smoothly and well that it had rather escaped notice. Although he had spoken generally in favour of the War Office he was not one of those who was satisfied with army organisation as it is at home now. Every District Command should be organised as an army corps, or division, and embrace every force within it. The old theory was that in the field anything up to 100,000 men should be organised in divisions, and anything over that should be organised in army corps. Too much pressure had been put upon the chief of the staff by the organisation in the present war. He objected to engineers being turned into clerks of works. He ventured to urge that an engineer officer should be attached to every infantry and cavalry regiment for a short period of time for the purpose of teaching rapid entrenchment, which undoubtedly was one of the things which the war had shown to be necessary. Then there was another important point, and that was with reference to the Reserves. He would strongly urge that an option should be given to men of fair character to receive twopence per day extra, and to be called "furlough reserve men," who could be recalled to the colours by a simple order from the Horse Guards, or from the officers commanding their regiments, so that whenever a regiment was wanted for a small war it could take these men with it. That would enormously increase our strength. If the Army had to meet men armed with modern weapons it should consist of regiments the men in which were accustomed to act together, actuated by that esprit de corps which makes a man do more if he is working with men whom he knows. Another point with which everyone would agree was that arrangements should be made whereby the Reservists should have shooting practice every year. In conclusion, he strongly urged the Committee to recollect what had been done in the way of sending an enormous force which, on the whole, was very well equipped, to South Africa. Of course, the War Department had to buy horses all over the place, and had to extemporise a large portion of their medical Department; but when the matter was fully analysed it would be found that the War Office had done well, especially in connection with the Militia and Volunteers. He hoped the War Office would publish a statement as to what had been done throughout the whole of the campaign. Everybody must feel that what the Army had to contend with was not only the extraordinary improvement in small arms, but also in the power of moving guns of position with a field force. He felt sure that if any other nation were placed in the same position it would have suffered quite as much.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): At the outset I desire to say that I admire the manner in which the Under Secretary for War has always answered us in debate. I have a great admiration for his assiduity and hard work, and I regret that I am put in a position of having to make a protest against the War Office. I think, however much we may like an individual, and however good the work of individuals may have been, still the whole conduct of this campaign has been so bad that some protest should be made, and I therefore shall move a reduction of this Vote, as a protest against the recent grave mistakes of the War Office, and also to call attention to the need for military reform. The only speech during this debate in which the War Office was not condemned, was that just delivered by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. Before I go into what I consider the graver mistakes that have been committed, I wish to ask one or two questions. The first is about the huts. In this Vote £500,000 is taken for huts in the United Kingdom. How many men will they accommodate, and whereabouts are they to be situated? Then I should like to ask a question as to the Royal Reserves. I have seen a great deal of them, and I have seen their absolute inefficiency up to the present time.

Colonel Blundell.

They have been cavalry without horses, infantry without rifles, lancers without lances, artillery without guns, and altogether a practically useless body. They have also been deficient in officers. When I asked a question a little while ago I was informed that the average proportion of officers to men was 14 per 1,000 in the infantry. Anyone who has done any soldiering at all will know that when you have got to drill men who have for years been unaccustomed to drill, when you have got to lick a regiment into shape, 14 officers to 1,000 is a ridiculously small proportion. It is much less than the proportion in foreign armies, where the officers are worked much harder, and where there are very many more non-commissioned officers than we have in the Reserve regiments. The result is that the Reserve force is of very little use either for foreign service or for the defence of this country. Then there is another question. There is an item in this Vote for medicines and instruments. I saw a letter from a medical man who had been out at the front, who complained that the medicines provided were not sufficient or varied enough, and that the instruments were not good enough for field and stationary hospitals. I should like to have an assurance as to the quality, quantity, and variety of the medicines sent out for the troops, and I have no doubt it can be given. There is an item also for small arms. I would like to hear that efficient small arms are issued to all the troops in South Africa, or who are now in training at home, and that they are not compelled to shoot with rifles that are worn out, and cannot shoot straight. Thousands of men are supposed to be going through their course of musketry instruction with worn-out rifles that will not carry straight. Is there any hope of the new rifles being given to the men within a reasonable time of the ending of the war? I hope to see them issued or ready for delivery by Christmas. Then, with regard to guns. Three millions are put aside for the Chinese Expedition; but I do not see any sum for more guns. I believe that 572 guns were ordered at the beginning of the year, and were included in the Army Estimates; but if there is to be a Chinese Expedition, more than these 572 will be required. I should like to see more position guns and field guns. One of my complaints against the War Office is that they knew that guns of position were used in the field at last year's German manoeuvres. We had representatives there who ought to have reported, if they did not report, upon them. I do not want to hark back on the ridiculous blunder of the War Office saying to the Australian colonies that they wanted infantry and not cavalry; but to this day we are suffering from a shortness of mounted troops and a shortness of horses. One initial mistake was made from which we have suffered enormously. When the Government knew that we should have something like 60,000 well armed and well equipped men to fight against, they only sent 10,000 from India and none from England. These 10,000 men were overwhelmed by superior numbers. Natal was invaded, our enemies were increased by rebels from our own colonies, and we had much greater difficulty than if the War Office had sent much greater forces at the beginning. They ought, at the very start, to have sent 10,000 troops from England in addition to those from India. The Commander-in-Chief said that an army corps was ready as soon as the transports, and we had more transports here than in India. We have been promised reforms in the War Office over and over again; yet two years ago it was found that there were serious deficiencies in the land transport. At the autumn manoeuvres, the War Office thought they could do with amateur transport, and they got an energetic private firm to undertake it. But it broke down utterly. At that time, therefore, the War Office knew that they had not land transport for 30,000 men in England. What happened? Whereas the 10,000 men sent from India had transport and everything necessary, the moment troops were required to be sent from England there was a great deficiency of transport.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): There was not.

MR. WARNER: I can prove it thoroughly. The first thing that Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener found when they went out to South Africa was that the regimental transport was utterly deficient. The officers' transport was reduced, and by great strain sufficient transport was managed to be obtained to make an advance—but an advance only along a railway—not transport sufficient to enable the army to march independent of the railway. Lord Methuen and other generals said over and over again that they had no transport sufficient to allow them to leave the railway. This want of transport has been the cause of the most serious reverses; the generals were compelled to make frontal attacks, which cost so many lives, instead of flank attacks, which they could have done had there been sufficient transport. Then, the sort of transport was wrong. So enamoured were the authorities at Woolwich of their wagons, that when Australia offered to supply transport for their own contingents they were told that the wagons must first come to Woolwich to be inspected. Of course, Australia did not send wagons to Woolwich. It was rather a long way round to South Africa. The last proof I will give of the failure of transport is that one of the greatest difficulties of the Royal Army Medical Corps was that their transport was reduced to one-fifth of what it ought to have been. That was an absolute crime—something akin to shooting the wounded—or it is a proof that the transport was deficient. I do not myself think it was a crime. The Royal Army Medical Corps did the best they could, but the transport was inefficient. We had letters read to the House in which it was stated that the troops had been fed on one biscuit a day. The greater proportion of Lord Roberts's army were on half rations not for one week or a month, but for nearly three months. It is not a question of the hardships that have to be endured in war. These must always be faced and suffered, and occasions must arise when, owing to temporary shortcomings in the transport, they will have to go on short commons; but for the main army in the field to be kept permanently on half rations, not for a week or two but for three months, is a shame. [AN HON. MEMBER: No.] Yes; the evidence is coming home gradually. Man by man, invalids and wounded soldiers are returning from the front telling the same story, and that story will be retold in the constituencies. One other difficulty the troops have been under which shows that the transport was not quite perfect, and that is that the money payments to the troops have not been forthcoming. I believe the greater part of the troops have not been paid for three months. I have seen a letter from a brother officer of mine who enlisted, in which he states that the men have not been paid; and I have seen many other letters which declared that there had been difficulties about the payment of the soldiers from March till June. I do not make these statements from hearsay; I have seen the letters, and that is proof that communications have been very badly kept up. There have been constant complaints of the failure of our artillery. What was my surprise to turn up the other day an old paper, printed in June, 1897, in which Lord Salisbury, in reply to a memorial from the Service Members in regard to the condition of both horse and field artillery, said—

“May I beg you to convey an assurance that I will, in conjunction with my colleagues, consider carefully the points to which you have directed the attention of Her Majesty's Government.”

These points may have been paid attention to in theory, but not in practice; and the result was that we went into the war with only two and a half guns per thousand soldiers, whereas every foreign Power provides five guns per thousand. Then, we went into the war without guns of position, whereas Germany had got guns of position mounted for use in the field. We must have inquiry not only in regard to the artillery, but into the surrenders of our troops, as to the reasons for our defeat after defeat, in which we lost guns and prisoners. We know that our men have not lost their pluck, that their shooting has not been at fault, that the generals have been very good; but there has been something deficient in the organisation. When we were told that there was to be an inquiry, of course we expected that it was to be before the dissolution; but the Government are putting it off until another Parliament is elected, and the sound of war has ceased, and the people are no longer anxious about sons who have been wounded, and have almost forgotten the relatives they have lost. We want something done sooner, out of which there may spring, not tinkering reforms, but reforms which will prevent breakdowns in the commissariat, in the hospitals, and in the line of battle. In the old phrase, somebody has got to be hanged. We will have to get a victim; but the day is seemingly to be put off before we find that victim. We say something must be done at once, some remedy found for this crying evil; and some assurance must be had that this new war for which we are asked to vote three millions to-day is not going to be carried on with the same blundering as in South Africa.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a reduced sum, not exceeding £11,499,900, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Courtenay Warner.)

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I wish to ask one question, but unfortunately there is no one present to ask it of. It is a little awkward when you have a question—

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Dr. TANNER, Cork County, Mid). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

MR. BARTLEY (continuing): I wish to ask one question on the subject of this Vote. It has been announced that there will be a very full inquiry into all the circumstances connected with this war. I am sure that the country will demand a very full and searching inquiry into all the details, and I have no reason to suppose that the Government will in any way shirk this. There is much that has been done to their credit, and I am sure much will be done by the inquiry for the benefit of the country. But there is one thing which has puzzled the man in the street a good deal, and that is what I want to ask about. We do not want the despatches published yet, but we think they ought to be published as soon as it is possible to do so. What we know is that the judgment of the Commander-in-Chief has been given on certain officers. Certain officers have been sent back from the seat of war to England. We must presume that that has been done for some reason which the Commander-in-Chief thinks of sufficient importance. What I wish to ask is this: how does it come about that officers who have held high command in South Africa, who have been sent home to England because they have evidently not been competent to carry on their work, are given high command when they come back to England, and are considered just as if they had been successful in the campaign from which they have been sent by the commanding officer? I think that is a matter in which a great number of people are interested. People do not like exactly to be personal. I myself do not know a single one of those who have come back, but I say that it is demoralising to talk about an inquiry into the losses, and into the actions which led to the disasters, when some of the officers who have been responsible for those disasters come home by the order of the Commander-in-Chief and at once take commands of high position in this country. That does seem to me a very extraordinary position. It seems to me that the duty of an officer, and especially a commanding officer, must be to be efficient in the field, and if these officers are sent home because they are not considered competent in the field, it is vital to the prestige of the Army, as affecting the recruiting and the position of the Army at home, that officers who are not fit to take command at the seat of war, should not be given high commands when they come to England. I am not a soldier, and I do not profess to know anything about it, but I know perfectly well that in any other line of life such a result would not be possible. Whether it is owing to the system of the War Office or some other reason I cannot say; but I should like to have an answer from the Under Secretary of State, if he can give it, how this comes about, because I can assure him that it is talked about in many parts. It is absurd to talk about the reorganisation of the War Office and putting things in order if, when a man has shown himself not to be efficient and is sent home, he is given a position of responsibility in this country. I do not wish in any way to say that anything personal has been charged against these gentlemen; I have no doubt they are excellent men and brave in all respects; but, when they have been held to be unfit to remain in their commands on active service, it is demoralising to the service altogether that they should be given as high positions in England as if they had been successful in the field. I hope the hon. Gentleman will be able to give some explanation of this before the debate is over.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): No one will contest the principles laid down by the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. It is difficult for us in some of these cases to form a judgment at present, but I venture to support the request he has made that the Under Secretary of State should give us some information on the point this evening. There are one or two other questions which I should like to ask the Under Secretary arising out of this. In the first place, can he tell us whether the £500,000 referred to in the Vote has been spent?

MR. WYNDHAM: There have been two sums of £500,000. There was the first £500,000, and the one now under consideration.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us about the sum for settlers, and what the probable annual cost of the garrison in South Africa will be? Are the settlers part of the garrison or not? What steps are being taken, if any, in the direction of this colonisation plan? For myself, without prejudging the matter, I cannot help confessing to considerable doubt as to whether any large enterprise of this kind is likely to be successful. I only hope that it may be found possible, because it will mean that that portion of the world would obtain a valuable ingredient to the population. For the guidance of the public it is very desirable in any enterprise of this kind that we should know whether or not the hopes of the authorities concerned are really based on anything solid and substantial in regard to the matter. It must be a matter of interest to know for how long a period it will be necessary to maintain the garrison in South Africa, and I would ask the hon. Gentleman to translate into figures what the annual burden will be. An hon. Gentleman who spoke a short time ago hazarded the statement that in his opinion we were not very near the end of the war. Everyone who has studied this Estimate must realise that it is based on the assumption that we are near the end of the war. On this question I do not mean in any way to pin the hon. Gentleman or the Government to any definite opinion they have not expressed; but surely it is reasonable, when we are considering an Estimate which provides for gratuities, a large sum for medals, and other what may be called terminal charges for the whole enterprise, to assume that in the view of the Government at any rate, as Parliament is going to rise, we ought to look forward to those charges. The total sum taken for these terminal charges is £7,500,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told us in the spring when bringing in the last war Estimate that he had estimated for the current expenses of the war until 30th September. If after that Estimate we have in the end of July an Estimate making provision for what are largely terminal charges, does not that imply to an ordinary man who looks at the matter that the Government at any rate do not think there is any obligation on them to look forward to any very long continuance of the current expenditure?

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member is really going off the rails. He has alluded to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he ought to keep in mind that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's announcement referred only to the actual money required. In Committee of Supply we have taken provision for war at full pressure for two months, and war at half pressure for six months, and this is the Supplementary Estimate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will have again to come to the House for Ways and Means, which is quite a different matter.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: I am very much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for his explanation. I am sure his explanation is perfectly clear to those who understand the intricacies, but to the ordinary man who is told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that provision has been made for the war to the 30th September, I think the inference is that the Government do not look forward to a long continuance of the expenditure after that date. It must be remembered, no doubt, that the burden of the war since the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his statement has been greater than he or anyone expected. The statement was made before the great outbreak of enteric, before the great loss of life by disease, and before the reinforcements necessary to replace this loss were sent. I must confess to considerable surprise at finding that we have now provision for the war being carried on at full pressure for two months and at half pressure for six months, and that we have "terminal charges" as well. I trust most sincerely that the estimate of the hon. Gentleman will not be exceeded, and I am sure that every Member in this House hopes that no further burden will be laid upon the Government or the country. I am not concerned myself to-night to criticise the War Office. For my part, I agree very largely with the hon. Member who said that the administration of the War Department had done a great deal more than we had any right to call upon them or expect them to do. I will reserve my right to criticise afterwards when we have fuller information. I can say that certainly on this occasion, just as on every other occasion since the beginning of this lamentable war, when the Government have come to the House for supply, I shall vote for the prosecution of the war. One reason why I think it very difficult to criticise what has been going on in South Africa with any judgment at present is the entire lack of official information. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last said he did not want the despatches.

MR. BARTLEY : I said not at present—not until the war is over.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR : I quite realise what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that decision more than I can say. I think it is the greatest mistake from the point of view of the confidence of the country in the administration of the Government in carrying out this war. I do not want the despatches produced in order to give critics an opportunity for making attacks upon the Government in the very least. I daresay it will not be believed, but I say it honestly and frankly that I do think it is the greatest mistake in the world that the Government can make not to give us from time to time the despatches containing the intelligence in regard to what is going on in South Africa. The hon. Gentleman in a speech not long ago referred to certain proceedings which the Government had been obliged to undertake, or, at least, to encourage, in order to stimulate the patriotism of the country, and to produce a sufficient number of recruits. He described the proceedings which took place, and I agree with him that they would be considered insane in any other country. I cannot help thinking that some of the people of this country considered them insane, or, at any rate, open to criticism. If you want the people of the country to form a sound and wise judgment as to the war, keep them informed. It is one of the liberties and rights of the country that they should be informed, responsible as they are in supporting the Government. It is the greatest regret to me that the Government have been so reticent in this matter of the publication of the despatches. I am sure it will have one effect—however much future proceedings may re-establish it—and that is, it must undermine and impair the confidence of the country in the Government, and if anything is necessary in such a matter as this it is that the Government should be strengthened, not by the artificial means of withholding information, but by full and unsparing intelligence. Our complaint is not confined to the non-publication of the despatches. It refers also to the censorship. Censorship which is purely military and for military purposes no one has any title or right to object to. It is absolutely necessary to an army in the field, and we must submit to the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief, whoever he may be. When the censorship is no longer military but is also political—because that is what the censorship in South Africa has been—I believe it becomes a great danger. Again I say that we cannot speak with full intelligence. I can produce to the Committee a number of telegrams which have nothing whatever to do with military operations, but relate to matters of business—communications going from this country to South Africa, entirely apart from military operations, which could not influence tactical or strategical operations in the least degree—which have been subjected to the censorship. That is the portion of the censorship to which I object in South Africa.

MR. WYNDHAM asked the hon. Member whether he complained of suppression or delay.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR : I complain of suppression. I have no doubt there has been delay. I complain not only of delay and suppression, but of editing and altering.

MR. WYNDHAM : That happens here occasionally.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR : I can assure the hon. Gentleman that to my knowledge there has been absolute suppression—that is to say, there has been suppression of parts of telegrams. This may have been necessary, but it is a very strong step to take, and it shows what a serious business this has been. It shows the self-restraint which has been exercised in the country when attention has not been more freely directed to this. It is common knowledge that a meeting took place some months ago at which some twenty Members of Parliament were present. I was not present, and therefore am not concerned personally. A message was sent out to South Africa reporting that the meeting had taken place. It was not merely curtailed and altered, it was suppressed.

MR. WYNNDHAM: Can you give the date?

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: I wish I had brought the papers here to give full information to the House. The meeting was held at the Westminster Palace Hotel and was attended by twenty Members of Parliament, who expressed their views on South African affairs, which I imagine they had a perfect right to do. A message reporting the result of the meeting was sent to South Africa. I have evidence which I shall be glad to submit to the hon. Gentleman. I have a letter from the telegraph office saying that the telegram was not delivered, and whether it was ultimately delivered I cannot say.

MR. WYNNDHAM: I think the hon. Member will see that a charge of that kind should not be brought in this way. I do not think he ought to say that a message was sent to South Africa conveying the result of a meeting unless he gives the contents of the message.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: I shall be very glad to do so. I am not fully prepared, as I did not intend to speak on this subject, but the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who preceded me suggested it to me. I shall be very glad indeed to give the Committee the facts. Let me look at the other side of the question. Not only has there been a great restriction of news going from here to South Africa, but there has also been a serious restriction in South Africa itself. I call attention to these matters because I think they should be known in order to give people materials for forming a sound judgment on the matter. I am not in a position to do more than complain about these matters. Question after question has been put during the whole of this session on these matters—questions which were not hostile and which were not put in an inimical spirit—to which frank, straightforward answers would have immediately silenced criticism. I can now read to the Committee the telegram to which I referred a few minutes ago.

Captain Sinclair.

MR. WYNNDHAM: The whole of the message?

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: The whole of the message. It is dated February 14th, 1900. This was sent to "News, Cape Town," which I understand is a telegraphic address.

"To News,

"Cape Town.

Feb. 14th, 1900.

"Influential conference Westminster to-day many Members Parliament delegates all parts support Bannerman, vigorous Liberal policy enthusiastically voted following Conference desires express appreciation strenuous efforts peace made by Cape and Natal Ministers, testifies deep sense difficulties forced upon colonists, especially severe strain inflicted upon Dutch by war with which Dutch entirely out of sympathy."

That is the message, and no one can say it is military; it certainly seems to me to have no tactical or strategical importance. This is the letter which came from the Eastern Telegraph Company, Limited, dated "London, 28th February, 1900."

"Dear Sir,—We have received advice from Cape Town to the effect that your telegram of 14th inst. addressed 'News, Cape Town,' has been stopped by the Government censor."

I will give the hon. Member another instance, and that is a telegram of condolence sent to Lady Symons by the late General Joubert. The telegram as it appeared in the press was as follows—

"Maritzburg, 26th Oct.

"The following telegram was received by the General Officer Commanding at Ladysmith to-day from General Joubert: 'In answer to your telegram of this date with reference to General Symons, I must express my sympathy and have to inform you that he was unfortunately badly wounded, died yesterday, and was buried. I trust the great God will speedily bring to a close this unfortunate state of affairs in which so many valuable lives have been and are being sacrificed, such as that of General Symons and others. I express my sympathy to Lady Symons on the loss of her husband.'"

The telegram, as sent, ran in this way in the latter portion—

"I trust the great God will speedily bring to a close this unfortunate state of affairs, brought about by unscrupulous speculators and capitalists who went to the Transvaal to obtain wealth, and in order to further their interests misled others and brought about this shameful state of warfare over all South Africa, in which so many valuable lives have been sacrificed, etc., etc."

to the end, as published. That was a telegram in which General Joubert expressed his opinion—an opinion in which no one here is called upon to share. I do not, by reading this telegram, commit myself in the least to the opinion therein expressed, but I think it proves that the censorship has not been purely military, but has extended to matters political. I have other instances I could bring before the Committee, but I think these are sufficient for my purpose, my sole object being to prove the existence of what appears to me to be a very serious state of things. The Government may have thought themselves entitled to take these very grave steps; I only wish they had been frank with the House and said at a very early stage, "Well, we have done these things; we have felt obliged to do them; but we are perfectly willing to bear whatever responsibility may attach to our action." We find in South Africa, also, the prohibition of newspapers under martial law. At the present moment, two newspapers, and two newspapers alone which took a side opposed to the war—Ons Land and the South African News—have their circulation prohibited, not only in the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony, but also in large districts of Cape Colony. That seems to disclose a most serious state of things.

MR. WYNDHAM: It is a serious state of things; that is what makes the course of action necessary.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: The hon. Gentleman is too experienced and far-seeing a man not to know that the liberty of the press is one of the essential liberties of persons living under the British constitution. You may be doing a very dangerous thing in suppressing all expression of opinion, and you may be furthering your policy in but a very slight degree if you take such stringent and severe measures as these. But I brought these matters forward simply to justify my statement that we are not in a position properly to criticise the Government because of the severity of the censorship. While I am perfectly ready to vote the money the Government ask for to-night, so far as the main purpose is concerned, I wish to say that I reserve my criticism in other respects. We have had very little information about China. We are asked to vote £3,000,000 for China. I do not want to be one of those who urge the Government to be aggressive in China—I know a little of the difficulties of their position at the present time; but if the hon. Gentleman can give us any further information as to how this money is to be spent and whether the Government have any grounds for believing that the limits of our expedition are known or can be estimated in any degree, I am sure it will be a satisfaction to the Committee. The Under Secretary drew a picture, perfectly justifiably, of the activity of the present Administration in regard to Army affairs. But there is another side to all that. We must not forget what this Administration has brought in other respects. It has brought us an expenditure of £62,000,000 on this war; it has brought us in South Africa a state of affairs which is nothing less than a military despotism; it has brought us to the beginning of a foreign roster in connection with the Indian Army. The balance, therefore, is not all on one side. I do not lay these things solely at the door of the present Government, but I believe the spirit on which the Government have relied has been largely responsible for bringing us into these difficulties. This being the only opportunity we have of criticising the action of the Government, I have ventured to avail myself of it, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will give us some information in regard to the 15,000 men who are to be settled in South Africa, the 30,000 who are to be the garrison, and the expenditure with reference to the hutting.

MR. SEELY (Lincoln): I have no wish to follow the hon. Member into his general discussion of the relative merits of particular parties, of the censorship, or of the publication of despatches, but I must say that any abuse of the Government for withholding despatches comes with extremely bad grace from any gentleman sitting on the benches opposite. There has been but one fierce and determined attack by the Opposition upon Her Majesty's Government, both in this House and in the country, during the whole course of the war, and that was made because they published certain despatches. The less, therefore, that hon. Gentlemen opposite say about the withholding of despatches the more it will redound to their own credit. But I rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he would answer a couple of questions. The first is whether he can give us any idea as to how many of the Militia regiments now embodied will continue to be embodied during the autumn. It may be quite impossible for the hon. Gentleman to answer, but it would be a great convenience to both officers and men if he could give some idea. The other question is whether he can give the Committee any information as to the intentions of the War Office in regard to the Volunteers and Imperial Yeomanry invalided home. I have no doubt the War Office will treat them with every consideration, and I hope, as far as possible, they will be enabled to go to their homes and their friends. They enlisted for the war, and they have suffered very great hardships, to which, although they may have been unavoidable, no one expected they would have been subjected. They are therefore entitled to every consideration, and I cannot help thinking that questions of this kind are of more interest to the country than any general abuse of Her Majesty's Government.

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): Until the speech of the hon. Member for Forfarshire there had been no reference in the course of this debate to the important question of the provision for military operations in China between now and February next. Important though the affairs relating to South Africa may be, I venture to say that we are face to face to-day with a still graver situation in the great Eastern Empire of China, with its 400 millions of people. As I understand the explanation given by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War, there is provided in the Vote under discussion a sum of £3,000,000 for military operations which may be necessary in upholding British rights and interests in China between now and next February. I cannot help noticing the enormous difference between the preparations made in the case of South Africa and in the case of China. To assert British rights and interests in the South African Republics, with a population numbering less than that of the city of Manchester, it has been necessary to send out 200,000 men. In regard to China, where our commercial interests are of infinitely greater importance than in South Africa—we were told the other night that of the £70,000,000 of import and export trade of China to-day the share of the British Empire is no less than £43,000,000, with unlimited opportunities for expansion in the future—provision is being made for sending out only 11,000 troops and 4,000 coolies. I venture to express grave doubts as to whether that is an adequate provision for upholding our just rights and interests. I desire no aggression upon China. The policy I advocate is that of preserving China for the Chinese, with equal opportunities for all nations to trade with her. With regard to what will happen when hostilities are over, and the question of settlement arises—which I hope will be in the direction of setting up an enlightened and stable government of Chinese to govern the Chinese and the opening up of the country to the trade of all nations—I put this case to the Government: If we stand on one side now, and if Russia has 50,000 troops on the ground, Japan 50,000, and France and Germany between them perhaps another 50,000, and Great Britain with her £43,000,000 out of the £70,000,000 of trade only 11,000 troops, how much regard will these other nations pay to the opinion of Great Britain as to what the terms of that settlement should be? If we are to have a proper influence in deciding what that just and equitable settlement should be it is incumbent upon us that we should take a proper share in the task of restoring order in that great Empire. My object is not to slay the Chinese or to advance upon Peking, as the German Emperor would have us do, as a matter of revenge. My object rather is that we should be to China what the most enlightened and patriotic Chinamen have expected us to be—namely, the friend of China, the friend who would help China to resist unjust aggressions of nations like Russia and Germany on the integrity of the Chinese Empire. It is on these lines that I say it is the duty of this country to have an adequate naval and military force in China—in the great Yang-tsze region, where, I believe, we have in the Viceroy of Nankin, and Hunan, and Hupeh, enlightened and patriotic Chinamen, who are doing their level best to maintain order, and to protect foreigners in the enormous territories over which they rule. What is required is that a British force should be there, not only to assist them to maintain order, but to guarantee to them full protection in their persons, official position, and property, should there be at the close of hostilities any attempt made to subject them to punishment for their friendly, patriotic, and enlightened action. It is for these reasons I believe the provision to be inadequate. I should have been much relieved if, instead of 11,000 we were going to send the full 22,000 men provided for in the Vote; I should have been encouraged to hear from the Under Secretary of State that Her Majesty's Government had included in this Vote the cost of transport for 10,000 British troops from South Africa to China; I should have been glad to hear that, as in the case of South Africa, Her Majesty's Government had made, if we cannot spare a sufficient number of native troops from India, an appeal to the Reserve forces—the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers—of this country to offer themselves for service in upholding British interests in China. I am glad to see that New South Wales, without waiting to be asked, has undertaken to send a certain number of troops to assist in the military operations in China, and Her Majesty's Government might well have given our other patriotic colonies an opportunity to assist in upholding what are the commercial interests, not of England alone, but of the whole Empire. The fact is that we earnestly hope that these serious disturbances which have arisen in China will remain local and will die out as quickly as they arise. But who is there here who can confidently predict that this outbreak of the Chinese against the foreign intruders will not assume larger proportions? I greatly justify the action of the Chinese because they have been exasperated beyond the limits of endurance by aggressions upon their territory from Russia and Germany, and those aggressions, in all probability, would not have taken place if Her Majesty's Government had adopted a firmer policy. These complications are consequent upon the want of a firmer policy on our own part in regard to our responsibilities in China, and it is a duty that rests upon us now to give all the necessary backing and assistance to China which we can, so that at the end of the trouble, this nation, at any rate, will have borne a worthy part in upholding that just principle of non-aggression upon Chinese territory, and thus show to the world that our only desire is to preserve China for the Chinese, and equal rights for all the nations to trade there.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton) said he intended merely to refer to some of the military questions which had cropped up in the course of the debate. One of those questions was the surrenders of British troops which had taken place in South Africa. Those surrenders were one of the most unaccountable things connected with this war, and it was a question which should be most thoroughly inquired into. He believed that in many cases these captures resulted from the want of fire discipline on the part of the men who had been isolated, who wasted their limited supply of ammunition. With magazine rifles their ammunition supply was very easily fired away. In many of these surrenders the British troops seem to have expended their ammunition somewhat recklessly, and instead of being able to hold their positions by steady firing and the careful preservation of their ammunition, a very great deal was wasted, and consequently the men were put at an immense disadvantage. But, whatever the causes might have been, it seemed to him that the commanding officers who surrendered with those troops, and who were responsible for taking up those positions, and for the disposition of those troops, and making the preparations for the advance, should most unquestionably be court-martialed; because in a court-martial they got evidence which was sworn, and they could go thoroughly to the root of the whole question. He did not mean to say that officers who had been temporarily in command should be tried, but whoever was responsible for taking up the position and the disposition of the troops in the place where they were surprised or captured should be tried by court-martial in the same way as a captain was tried for the loss of his ship. He believed that that rule in the Navy had been of the utmost importance in maintaining that firm determination to die rather than to surrender. With regard to the treatment of their men in South Africa, whatever failure there had been was the result of having to put something like 220,000 men in the field when they were only prepared to put perhaps 30,000 or 60,000 men in the field. Therefore, it was clearly attributable to their faulty system. If there had been unnecessary suffering for want of proper medical treatment it was clearly the fault of their system and not the fault of individuals. Personally he believed that their medical officers did the very best that was within their power. It had been found necessary to attach young doctors to the service to meet the emergency. In any future reorganisation of the Army Medical Department he trusted that those responsible would take into consideration the advisability of giving to the Army medical officers more experience in the treatment of the various diseases and of wounds than they had in the past. He would suggest that in the future the Army Medical Staff should be able to go to the London hospitals or hospitals in other towns in order to increase their knowledge; where they would be face to face with the teachings of modern medical science and so increase their knowledge and improve their power of taking care of the officers and men in the Army. The hon. Member for Central Sheffield had referred to scouting. He wished to say that if scouting was to be properly done they would have to adopt an entirely new system. As one who had been a commanding officer he could say that not only was there no proper encouragement given under the present system for training in this most valuable part of cavalry manoeuvres, but there was no proper time set apart for this important work. Scouting meant that they must use their horses and travel over a very large extent of country. He knew a case where a commanding officer was exceedingly keen about scouting, but when his regiment came to be inspected he was not praised for his scouting, but he was blamed because his horses were not in such a good condition. Practical scouting work meant incessant work for both horses and men, for they must be out all day, and they would have to put aside a great deal of show. Regiments were never praised for scouting work, and they never got any credit for it. If they were going to teach their cavalry how to scout well, and their infantry to shoot well, and to teach both how to use a spade and to be able to shelter themselves behind entrenchments they must entirely change the whole system, so that commanding officers would be encouraged to train in this respect. They would have to change the generals who were to judge these commanding officers. They required an entire change of system, and they must put aside something of the show of the Army and look more to the practical side and judge regiments more by their real work. Many clouds were rising on the horizon. The Secretary of State said that we have no field army at home. He unhesitatingly said that the money which had been spent in forming Reserve battalions had been simply wasted. The Under Secretary had spoken of the men who would soon return to this country from South Africa. We might find ourselves face to face with a war against a great continental nation. Therefore, it was necessary that those men should take their places immediately in a great framework. Those troops would return to this country simply as battalions, and there would really be no proper field force in this country. Nobody could doubt the ability of the Under Secretary for War, and the War Office could not have found a more able and brilliant advocate, for they all recognised his ability. They all recognised his power and his devotion to the work, but he would go so far as to say that he believed, in this critical time, when they had a great war on their hands in South Africa, and when there was a possibility of a rising in China, it would have been better for this country if no such able advocate as the Under Secretary had been found to defend the War Office. In that case the War Office, in all its nakedness, would have been before the country; but the hon. Gentleman had, by his skill and gift of language, thrown a screen over the War Office and over its misdoings which to him was a proof of his great ability and his great talent, but he ventured to say that those abilities might be to the detriment of his country.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): Several hon. Members who have spoken have made a demand that some guarantee should be given by the Under Secretary with regard to an inquiry into the mistakes that have been made in the course of the South African campaign. The demand for that inquiry has been made not from this side of the House alone but also from hon. Members on the opposite side, and this demand is shared by all parties in the State and by public opinion outside. There have been mistakes in the course of this campaign in South Africa which have been absolutely inexcusable. We have had surrenders, disasters, and mistakes which, to put it mildly, call for the closest inquiry. In my humble judgment the Government are not to be blamed for tactical mistakes, but they are to be blamed if they do not realise that there is an opinion outside which demands a fuller inquiry than that which has yet been promised into these disasters. The Magersfontein disaster and others present themselves vividly to our minds. Some well-informed persons hold the opinion that those disasters could have been avoided, and they also consider that the enormous number of men who have surrendered is something extraordinary and demands an explanation. We are entitled to demand before this debate closes some assurance from the Government that those generals who have made these mistakes will have to pay the penalty of those errors which have resulted in the loss of so many valuable lives. My complaint is that, instead of making these inquiries, the men who have made these mistakes have been given important appointments simply because they have made those mistakes. Some of them have been given most important commands over here. Do the Government think that that is going to satisfy public opinion? Here you have men who have undoubtedly been the cause of these disasters in South Africa, who have been recalled, and they have been given most important commands over here. No doubt the War Office may be able to give a proper explanation of their attitude upon this matter, but public opinion outside is entitled to say that, until we know that the inquiry has been held and its result made known, and until we know what evidence has been given on behalf of these men, they certainly ought not to be entrusted with important commands in this country. We have not had a full and square promise from the Government of any such inquiry into these mistakes. It will not do to let this matter go on for a year or two. The public opinion of Scotland will not be satisfied about Magersfontein until we know who is responsible for that great mistake. And so with the other unfortunate disasters of the campaign. One fact which this debate brings home to our minds more clearly is the gigantic nature of the task which this House committed itself to when it passed £10,000,000 for the South African campaign. It has shown us that we must not attach too much importance to what Gentlemen say from the Front Bench as to what a war is going to cost. The Leader of the House has said that upon this subject the Government knew no more than the man in the street. They asked us for £10,000,000 for a start, and here we are nine or ten months afterwards, and we have got up to £61,000,000, which we are told is required to provide for the campaign up to the end of February next. I have one or two questions to ask about that. We ought upon such an occasion as this to have, with the sources of information at their disposal, something like a reliable opinion as to how long this war is going to last. I notice that the Under Secretary smiles at that question, but we are generally treated with a smile when we ask for information. If the Minister responsible comes down here and asks for another £11,000,000 after the war has been going on for eight months, is it too much to ask whether he considers this amount is going to be sufficient?

MR. WYNDHAM: The whole of this money is not for the carrying on of the war.

MR. DALZIEL: I have read the Parliamentary Paper, and I could not possibly have made that mistake, for I have heard the different interruptions made by the hon. Member in the course of this debate. I did not assume that all this money was for the carrying on of the war, but what I want to know is whether the hon. Gentleman intends coming down again for any additional sum for the South African campaign. Will he promise us that we shall have no more demands made upon us for this war?

MR. WYNDHAM: Upon the introduction of this Estimate, I stated that there were two factors which could not be determined, and they were China and South Africa. I stated that in regard to these two factors it was impossible to give an accurate forecast of our requirements beyond the end of February.

MR. DALZIEL: The hon. Member says that he does not know, so far as China is concerned, what is going to happen, and we are all painfully aware of that fact. We shall know more about it when this Parliament is a little older. The hon. Member will not, of course, be able to give us an absolutely authoritative opinion as to how long the war is going to last, but we have a right to expect, now that we have both capitals in our hands and over 200,000 men on the spot, an opinion as to whether or not we are to be asked for another Estimate. We are asked to pass this money, and in the view of the Government it will provide for the campaign up to the end of February. But why to the end of February? I presume this House will meet again about the middle of January, and why should we provide to the end of February, when most people expect that the House will before that time be called upon to vote that money if it is found to be necessary? The Government have no right to make such a demand upon the House of Commons. They have a right to ask for sufficient money to provide for their requirements to the end of this session, and until the ordinary time which Parliament assembles. I should like the Under Secretary to give us a little more information on that point. With regard to the gratuities, I do not know whether they are intended to be a complete Estimate so far as this campaign is concerned. I trust also that the War Office will give their close attention to the question of the treatment of the sick and wounded on their return from South Africa. Anyone who goes about very much must have noticed the sickening spectacle of so many wounded soldiers and officers who are to be met with everywhere, and who bring painfully to mind the effects of this campaign. I think the Government will be supported by public opinion and by all parties in anything they may do to provide for the comfort of these men in the future. We know that at present there is a lot of sympathy for them, but not much money, and I desire that the Government should appoint a special Committee to inquire into the manner in which these wounded soldiers are to be provided for when this campaign is over. It will take a great deal of money to provide for these unfortunate men in a proper manner. We all know that, at the time a large number of these deaths took place in the war, almost invariably a certain amount of money was due to these soldiers. I wish to ask what steps the Government take in the case of privates to whom sums of money are due at the time of their death. I understand that the practice has been to advertise in certain newspapers, which are not always read by the people who should benefit by the amount that is due to these privates. I would suggest to the Under Secretary that he should give his consideration to this question, in order to make it easier for the relatives of deceased soldiers to know what amount of money can be claimed. With regard to remounts, I should like to ask whether proper precautions are taken, in connection with the purchase of horses, to see that they are satisfactory from the point of view of the country to which they are being sent and the nature of the campaign which they have to undergo. I know that in certain parts of Scotland certain gentlemen paid prices for horses which were altogether beyond the mark. A large number of the horses purchased on behalf of the War Office were sent to Liverpool, and a large number of them were never shipped at all, but were rejected upon arrival at Liverpool. I should also like to know whether the Under Secretary is prepared to meet the demand which has been made in reference to this disparity in the pay of the soldiers in South Africa. It is a curious thing that Tommy Atkins, who has gone from this country, only gets about 1s. 3d. per day, whereas if he happened to have enlisted in South Africa, he would have got something like 5s. or 5s. 6d. a day. I do not wish to underestimate the loyalty of our Colonial troops, but if a Colonial soldier is paid 5s. a day for doing the same work as Tommy Atkins, I think there is a case made out for an increase in the pay of Tommy Atkins. I should like the Under Secretary to tell us how it comes about that our Colonial troops are paid so much more than our own privates, and I should be interested to hear whether he can give some increased pay to these men who are so nobly fighting our battles. I have only one other question to ask, and it is whether the Under Secretary contemplates that there will be complete provision made for China so far as this Vote is concerned. I asked this question before, but I did not receive a satisfactory reply. It seems to me that the Government have totally failed to realise the importance of the situation. If the Government had been fully alive to the situation I do not believe that the present state of affairs would have occurred at all. I do not believe, if the Government had shown a little more foresight, that all this valuable time would have been lost, which has resulted, it must be feared, in the unfortunate massacres at Peking. I do hope that the Under Secretary will give us some sort of assurance that the Government are fully alive to their responsibilities in regard to China.

Mr. Dulziel

*MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) said he wished to call attention to the treatment of the 13th Imperial Yeomanry, commonly called "The Duke of Cambridge's Own," who were captured at Lindley and taken prisoners by the Boers. No doubt they had to surrender through no fault of their own, but they did expect that when those men had been captured they should be treated with a little humanity by the enemy, for all Boer prisoners had been treated by this country with great consideration. When the 13th Imperial Yeomanry arrived at Kroonstad they received an order from General Colville at Lindley to proceed to join him at Lindley, which was forty miles distant, on the following day. They had already ridden fifteen miles, but they set off immediately and rode through the whole of the night and arrived at Lindley on the Sunday morning. The advance guard entered the town without seeing any of the enemy and expected to find there the general who had sent for them. But no such general was there, and they had not been given a word of warning. The Boers had obscured themselves inside the houses and they waited until the advance guard arrived in the market place when they deliberately fired them down. The colonel saw his advance guard in trouble and so he withdrew his force and secured a good position behind two kopjes. There his little band of between some 300 and 500 men, who had started out with only one day's rations, had to fight for four days and four nights against the Boers without the assistance of artillery, although the Boers used artillery against them. At last all their ammunition was spent and they had to surrender. During those four days Colonel Spragge sent off messengers to where he supposed Colonel Colville would be to tell him he was in trouble. His message was conveyed to Lord Methuen, who arrived at Lindley only to find that the rebel forces had left and had taken the Yeomanry as prisoners off to Reitz. They were then taken across the Vaal into the Transvaal and they crossed the line before General Buller arrived there. They must have been taken a distance of about 150 miles, and they had heard nothing about them since. It was some seven weeks ago that this surrender took place, and they had no information up to this very date as to whether these English prisoners were compelled to march the whole of that distance on foot, or how they got there at all. They knew that a great many of them were weak and sick, and had to be left behind. The prisoners who were left at Reitz were put over the Natal border, and arrived at Ladysmith in a starved and naked condition. They had been credibly informed that there was nothing like adequate medical service where the British prisoners had been confined, and that the food supplied them was inferior and insufficient. It seemed to him that they ought to be able to alleviate all this suffering in some way. In the same papers which told them of this want of information in regard to these prisoners they were informed that from day to day Boer prisoners were well treated, and that even the Boers were able to obtain medical assistance and medical comforts for their wounded from the British troops. He knew that the Under Secretary had sent a telegram to the Boers.

MR. WYNDHAM: What more can we do?

*MR. KIMBER said he was aware that if an English messenger was sent unarmed he might be refused admission, and might be shot as a spy, but had the Foreign Office made any real effort? Was the Foreign Minister willing to give him a letter if he would undertake to find someone who would try and get it through to the enemy? It was an extraordinary thing that seven weeks should have elapsed without being able to get any information as to the condition of those unfortunate prisoners, and he thought they were entitled to expect some better effort on the part of the War Office. If the War Department could not do it why not try another department? He trusted that some method would be found by which information could be obtained in regard to those unfortunate prisoners of war.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I am most unwilling to add to the long list of questions which the Under Secretary has to answer. We have had three Army Estimates in which the expenditure relating to the war in South Africa has been dealt with, but I have not been able to gather from the statement made to-night what will be the total normal expenditure on the Army for this year apart from China and apart from South Africa, and I also want to know what is the normal expenditure which we may expect next year and the year following. I daresay the hon. Member will be able to give us that figure without much trouble. We have lately been discussing the Navy Estimates, and we know that this year, taking into account the expenditure on naval works, the Navy expenditure amounts to £30,000,000. I should like the hon. Gentleman to tell us in the same way, including the expenditure on military works, what he estimates to be the total expenditure of the Army for this year. We want to know what we have got to look forward to. That is the only specific question which I wish to address to the hon. Gentleman, but there are one or two other points upon which I should like to say a few words. A good deal has been said about the necessity of an inquiry into the general conduct of the war. My right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition spoke in a rather depreciatory manner of inquiries which were made under similar circumstances, but he showed very clearly that the Government began with what was equivalent to a promise that there should be a general inquiry into the whole conduct of the campaign. I will assume, for the purpose of my present argument, that this war was inevitable, and that the diplomacy of the Colonial Secretary had nothing whatever to do with it, and that it was forced upon us by actions for which we in this country were not responsible, but of which we had an intelligent anticipation. One of the subjects of such an inquiry would undoubtedly be the preparation made for this "inevitable" war by those who twelve months ago were in charge of the destinies of the Empire. I have endeavoured to procure some evidence bearing upon that point, and the hon. Gentleman has answered the inquiry I made by the Return which he gave the other day about the amount of warlike stores which had been borrowed by the Army from the Navy. That Return was estimated to the end of the year, and, therefore, I am not surprised that the amount is very small. I thought the Army had borrowed from the Navy to a much larger extent than this account shows. At the bottom of the Return there is a note which says—"No information has been received as to the amount of ammunition, stores, spare parts, &c., transferred in South Africa." Until we know how much the Army had to borrow from the Navy in South Africa, we are not in a position to say how much the Army was behind its proper state of preparation and how much it had to depend on the Navy at the beginning of the campaign. About six months ago we not only had to borrow naval guns for land service, but we had to borrow searchlights, and the hon. Gentleman could not give me any information as to why the Army had to borrow searchlights. Therefore, until that Return is made complete by including South African borrowings as well as others, we cannot say how much the preparations of the Navy contributed to make up for the want of preparation of the Army in the initial stages of this war. If there is to be a kind of general inquiry, this ought to be one of the subjects to be inquired into. Surely when the opinion of the country has got to be taken upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government in South Africa, one of the things upon which the country should be advised is not merely the state of your medical arrangements, upon which you have appointed a Royal Commission, but also the general preparation of the Government for this campaign and the general conduct of it. I do not see how this House can come to any conclusion on the subject unless that information is before us. Not only is a general inquiry desirable and necessary, but if I may venture to speak of the examples set by the little connection I have had with the sister service, I should say there is a case for demanding a special inquiry into these disasters.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Koorn Spruit.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I will not mention Koorn Spruit.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I will.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: If one of Her Majesty's ships is lost or stranded, that is a crime on the part of the officer whose negligence has caused it, for which that officer can be put on his trial. It is a crime followed by severe punishment if any person deliberately or by negligence loses or hazards one of Her Majesty's ships. There is another provision which says that where no specific charge can be brought against any officer or man the charge is to be preferred against all of them, and all of them may be called upon to answer that charge. I do not know enough about military law to say whether there is any similar provision for the Army, but I cannot for my life distinguish between the losing, hazarding, or stranding of a ship and the loss of a convoy or a regiment, or one of those disasters which have occurred so often in the course of this war. Let me take a specific instance. One of the earliest disasters in this war was the disaster at Nicholson's Nek. Sir George White, the commander in charge there, most gallantly and honourably took upon himself the whole responsibility for that failure. I well remember the vindictiveness with which the disappointed stockbrokers and halfpenny newspapers attacked Sir George White when all that was known of the facts was simply that the disaster had occurred and that Sir George White took the whole responsibility. Sir George White was afterwards locked up in Ladysmith, but that does not do away with the necessity for an inquiry. What has happened since? I will not dwell upon the jingo ovations which Sir George White received upon his arrival in this country from those people who formerly denounced him, which I think he accepted much too readily. Surely the man who was responsible for that disaster should not have gone about receiving these compliments for what he had done. Surely something is due to the Army and the country in a matter of this kind. Sir George White, having gone through these ovations, has now been appointed to a high command, and I do not believe there has been any inquiry into this loss at Nicholson's Nek, which is on all fours with the loss of Her Majesty's ship "Victoria," which was commanded by Sir George Tryon. I notice that there are some hon. and gallant Members present who have been connected with the Navy, and I would ask them what would have happened if Sir George Tryon had survived the terrible disaster in the Mediterranean? Supposing he had come forward and said, "Nobody is to blame but myself," would he not have been put on trial? Would there have been no inquiry? Not only would there have been an inquiry, but every officer on board would have been put upon trial. This is the discipline of the Navy, and I do not know why similar discipline should not prevail in the Army. If discipline in the Army is the same as discipline in the Navy, then I would ask why that which would undoubtedly have taken place in the Navy has not taken place in the Army. Has it taken place or is it going to take place? I do not know whether any hon. Member will say that there is any real difference between the responsibility of an officer at Nicholson's Nek and the responsibility of a naval officer on the "Victoria," which was lost six years ago. I will leave the point where it is, trusting that the hon. Gentleman in his reply will say something about it. The only other observation I want to make relates to the status of officers in Her Majesty's Army. I addressed some observations to the Committee on that subject six months ago, at the beginning of the session. At that time disasters like that of Nicholson's Nek were fresh in the memory of the people, and had made a vast impression on them. They had made the impression that however good the rank and file might be the officers did not appear to be adequate to the work. It was not my impression, but I could easily refer to the journalistic literature of the time to show that that was the general impression. I call the hon. Gentleman's attention to this, that vastly important as the duties of an officer of the Army are, we appear for many years past, although purchase has been abolished, to have limited ourselves to a small class of the population for recruiting the officer staff of the Army, and we have done so by the most reprehensible and the most vulgar of all possible standards. We have established between the safety and honour of the country and the Army an ignoble and detestable standard—the money competency of the officer. We know that, in the main, our system up to this point has apparently been that no man shall serve the Queen as an officer unless he has, in addition to the meagre pay provided for him in the lower ranks, an income of his own sufficient to defray the customary expenses of his position. I say, from the information I have, and which I believe still to be true, that we pay salaries to the officers which are too small, and that in the face of these small salaries we permit and even encourage expenditure which is incompatible with life in the service. No man but a rich man can enter the Army—no man, I believe, who is not in a position to have something from his parents or relations in addition to his pay, and the hon. Gentleman himself was candid enough to acknowledge the truth of this indictment, so far as the cavalry is concerned. I venture to doubt whether the hon. Gentleman remembers it, because he has shaken his head. I remember very well, with regard to the cavalry, he said it was a scandal that a man could not be an officer unless he had £500 a year. Has he done anything to amend that state of things? Has the Government, which through him acknowledged this scandal in the cavalry six months ago, done anything to remove that scandal? The hon. Gentleman is apparently inclined to deny my right to refer again to the matter. The cavalry is an important arm, and the weakness of the cavalry is one of the causes of the disasters we have suffered in this war, and in the face of history I am entitled to repeat what I said before. Now we know that that which was an admitted scandal six months ago in the cavalry is a scandal still, and unless we have some assurance on that point from him I must assume that it is the intention that it shall remain. The cavalry is not the only branch of the service in which this so-called scandal obtains. I consider it is a scandal in any branch of the Army if an officer from his earliest days is not able to live on his pay so as to meet all the expenses which are customary and proper. I should like to impress upon the House that this is not a matter of scandal merely, but it is a matter of safety. I have seen many letters in the newspapers on the subject, and one in particular struck me. It was from one who described himself as "A Country Gentleman." It was a great grievance to him that he could no longer afford to pay his family in the Army. It goes far beyond that. Not only has a country gentleman the right to send his son into the Army, but the country gentleman's gardener or any other servant has the right to do the same, and if a young man has the right to take that position he should be paid in a manner to enable him to live. If you do not do that you are barring talent out of the Army, as in so many other branches of the public service, on the vulgar ground that the person possessing it has not money enough to support the position. I want to press the hon. Gentleman for an answer on this matter, which I pronounce to be not only a scandal but a danger to the public safety.

MR. WYNDHAM: I think those who have listened to the last speech, and who remember what I ventured to say in introducing this Vote in the afternoon, will almost agree with me that I was well advised in making a self-denying ordinance when I said that I did not intend to repeat the things I said on the previous Estimates. What is the use of such repetition? This question of the pay of officers in the Army, and more particularly of the cavalry officers, I have dealt with on the Estimates at an earlier period. Moreover, I have gone further than the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the Committee, for I have made a calculation by which I find that, quite apart from any expenditure on pleasure, the cavalry officer who lived the life of a convict, and never went out of his barracks, would have to spend about £130 a year out of his own money, in addition to his pay, in order to discharge his obligations. The hon. Member has, if the term is not an un-Parliamentary one, made an Old Bailey point. ("Hear, hear," and cries of "Order.") I thought I was entitled to use that expression. The hon. Member said "What have you done?"

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: What are you going to do?

MR. WYNDHAM: And therefore by that it appears he means that the Committee are to hold that a Supplementary Estimate is the proper instrument for bringing forward a legislative proposal which affects the Estimate of the year; he knows perfectly well, however, that there is no precedent to justify the bringing forward any proposal—such as, for example, the granting of a further allowance to officers in their quarters or any similar proposal which might diminish the charge falling on them, except upon the Estimates of the year; he knows perfectly well that until the Estimates of the year fall in no Minister would tell the Committee in one financial year what the department were likely to propose in the next financial year. The whole of the last six minutes of his speech were devoted to a point which I really do not think ought to be made in that Committee when they are assembled here to deal with another matter. I should like to thank my right hon. and gallant friend the Member for North-east Manchester for the generous and most just reply which he made to certain attacks which have this evening been directed against the Secretary of State for War. I think that the language he used was so good that his sentiments [laughter]—yes, it is not an easy thing to repel attacks of the kind that have been delivered. (Mr. MACNEILL interjected a remark which did not reach the gallery.] I hope that the hon. Gentleman opposite will not interrupt me. The words which fell from my right hon and gallant friend were, I think, echoed in the sentiments of all those who listened to him. Let us consider the nature of these attacks. It is said that the Secretary of State for War has been in office five years, and that he has not achieved everything which ought to have been achieved. But during the whole of the debate Member after Member has risen and said that my noble friend has done more than any of his predecessors upon the very question of the Army Medical Corps, which has been in the forefront of the discussion. One Member said, "You should return to the regimental system." Another said, "You should not have given titles to the Royal Army Medical Corps." Proposals have been made, but they have been diverse and even opposite. We have the assurance from the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire that more has been done for the Royal Army Medical Corps by the present Secretary of State than any other. Then, again, I ask, what is the use of coming down with all this against the Secretary of State for War because the establishment of the Army Medical Corps is not adequate to the situation? He has proposed an establishment higher than ever previously existed and has not been able to obtain the number of officers he requires. It is said that the rewards that are offered are not sufficient, but, acting on the advice of his military advisers, he has gone further than any of his predecessors in the way of offering inducements to tempt young physicians to enter the Army Medical Corps. When it is a matter of common knowledge that the great medical schools have boycotted the Royal Army Medical Corps for years in order to exact, if I may put it so, military rank, and when their wishes have been met by the Secretary of State for War, is it fair to attack the Secretary of State because he has not sufficient officers to meet the situation? I will not dwell upon this, for the point has already been threshed out, and what is to be said on either side is well known to every member of the Committee. In view of the efforts made to increase the Army Medical Corps, in view of the fact that the establishment voted has not been reached, I myself am convinced that this is one of those questions of reorganization which demand from us our most careful attention and most strenuous effort at the end of the war. But we cannot do this now. In my belief no increase of pay, no exaltation of rank can be expected in time of peace to attract a sufficient number of young, keen and ambitious men to fill up the places that must be filled up in time of war. You might offer a young man £500, £700, or £800 a year, but he is not going to bury himself under a cloud in time of peace at any military centre to attend a few hundred men suffering from the customary ailments of this country. He wishes to work in the country. He is perfectly ready to work for little or no remuneration in the slums of a great city or in the wards of a great hospital. He wants the practice and experience necessary for a successful career. Therefore, I have myself come to the conclusion that instead of striving to expand the establishment of the Army Medical Corps in time of peace to be adequate for the time of war, it will perhaps be necessary to have a very efficient and highly trained Army Medical Corps, and to make application to the great hospitals throughout the country to know in time of peace what men will be ready in time of war, or when you have a great concentration of troops in camp, to come forward and work for the Army as they would work in a great city in time of pestilence. I do not know whether this is the opportunity for submitting such conclusions, but some such idea as that must underlie the whole of our future policy in respect to the Army. If it is impossible in time of peace to secure men for your establishment it will also be difficult in time of war. You must secure doctors and chaplains in time of peace by means of a retaining honorarium, and claim their services in time of Imperial crisis. After what I have said, I think hon. Members generally must feel that the attacks upon the Secretary of State are most unjust. Since he has been responsible for the War Office, before the war or the rumour of war, my noble friend, with the Under Secretary, now at the Foreign Office, was able to persuade Parliament to increase the home establishment by 25,000 men; they secured the great measure for acquiring land on Salisbury Plain at a great cost; they have provided more money for rifle ranges than any of their predecessors; they undertook the question of coast armaments, and millions have been voted year by year to give the country modern guns in place of the obsolete armaments we found when the present Government took office. I could go on, but I have travelled over that ground before, but I do feel that it is unjust and unfair to attack the present Secretary for War, who in his period of office has really done more than any of his predecessors in the way of bringing points before Parliament and getting them settled. There is really nothing to add upon this, but there is another point upon which I have a word or two to say. Rumours have from time to time reached me, and I am glad at last to know what really is the charge made against the exercise of the censorship in South Africa. There has been a great deal of mystification over it, and when I said in the debate the other day that letters of pressmen had not been censored, I was rudely interrupted. In order that the House should be in full possession of the facts the correspondence as to the exercise of the censorship has been published, and it contains a very clear letter from Sir Redvers Buller, in which he said that no man liked interfering with the correspondents less than he did, but that he found that without the censorship his plans were invariably disclosed, but that when it was applied a few days before an important operation his plans were not disclosed, and were therefore successful. Can it be said, when the total of our casualties amounts to 20,000 or 30,000 men, that such an exercise of the censorship is unreasonable? So far, the hon. Member for Forfar agrees with me, I believe.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: May I remind the hon. Gentleman that it was on my motion on behalf of an hon. friend that that correspondence was produced?

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, after I had offered it three or four times. Although many questions of a vague character were addressed to me about the censorship no very great keenness was exhibited to come down to the facts; and I am not surprised, for what are the facts? This correspondence was published, and the hon. Member has to-night disclosed the whole of this atrocious business. He said there had been a political meeting at the Westminster Palace Hotel, attended by twenty Liberal Members, and that a message was sent to South Africa and had not been delivered there. I at once interrupted the hon. Member, and said that if these charges were made they must Mr. Wyndham.

be made specifically; that the Government must be told what that message was; and the hon. Member was good enough to read the terms of that message.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: May I ask the hon. Gentleman, did he not know that the question I addressed to him to-night had been put on the Paper of the House addressed to him?

MR. WYNDHAM: I did not remember that, but I am very glad the hon. Member has given the terms of the message to-night. I cannot really carry them all in my head, but some of them were to the effect that twenty Liberal Members of Parliament in favour of a vigorous Liberal policy wished to express their sympathy for the Dutch in the strain to which they were subjected.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: If the hon. Gentleman quotes, perhaps he would be kind enough to quote correctly. The terms were "Dutch colonists," "subjects of the Queen in South Africa."

MR. WYNDHAM: That is the whole point of it. The hon. Member asks whether there would be any objection to such a message being published in this country. None at all. It is in terms to which we often listen in this House; but if the hon. Member were himself the censor in South Africa, and he found 10,000 of these very Dutch in a state of rebellion, and some 30,000 or 40,000 more trembling on the verge of rebellion and being persuaded to take the fatal step by precisely that kind of inducement, would he not have hesitated before publishing it? Of course he would. He would have said "This is not a telegram which ought to be published at Aliwal North." The hon. Member gave another illustration. He said that a telegram from General Joubert to Lady Symons had been presented in an altered form. He read the telegram in the form in which it was received. No word which redounded to the good judgment and good heart of General Joubert had been omitted. The words omitted were those which declared that the whole of the war was due to the unscrupulous operations of speculators on the Stock Exchange.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: And so it was.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member for South Donegal has made himself responsible on more than one occasion for that preposterous statement.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: And I stick to it.

MR. WYNDHAM: It does no harm in this country, but in Natal, where the loyalist farmer was having his farm burned down, where he was being told that the game was up and that the Dutch were going to sweep the British into the sea, that the British were an effete race and had no soldiers at their command and were the mere tools and playthings of these imaginary speculators, the effect would be very different, and I ask again, would the hon. Member, had he been censor, have permitted that message to be published?

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: The hon. Gentleman asked whether I would have allowed the first telegram to be published in Aliwal North. That means, would I have allowed it to be published in a district under martial law. That does not meet my point at all. That telegram was stopped altogether, and was not published at all. I quoted it to prove that the censorship was not merely military, but was also political.

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not know why the hon. Gentleman interrupted me. It is a perfectly clear issue. He thinks the message to which he referred ought to have been delivered. On the other hand, I think it ought not. I do not think that hon. Members can persuade the House that messages of that character should be published, and I am glad to find that there is no more in the suspicions that have been entertained. Now to come to the broader question of an inquiry. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean appeared to agree with me that the time for an inquiry and the publication of the despatches had not arrived. But, as to the censorship, the right hon. Gentleman said that the press messages as to the battle at Nicholson's Nek and Lombard's Kop, in the earlier stage of the war, were censored. I have no doubt they were, and I imagine that the right hon. Gentleman would agree with me that, if Sir George White had permitted information as to the extent of the loss sustained by an army that was being invested, and which, as a matter of fact, was invested for four and a half months, to be given to the outside world, and the straits in which he was placed, he would not have been able to keep the enemy at bay. These questions are not so simple as they seem. They cannot be decided by laying down a broad proposition and by saying this ought to be published and this ought not. Some amount of discretion must be vested in our officers. It may be asked, did they exercise that discretion wisely?

SIR CHARLES DILKE: I only used that fact regarding the censorship as showing that we knew none of the facts with regard to the battle, and that we did not know them now.

MR. WYNDHAM: I think what was said with regard to the letters from Ladysmith rather completes the case as to the censorship. Whether hon. Members thought that the military authorities were right or wrong, no doubt such communications as those referred to by the hon. Member for Forfar were suppressed as well as communications as to the state of the Army in Ladysmith. That was the story of the censorship, and on the facts as stated by the Opposition, I say the proper course has been followed. The right hon. Baronet asked, however, and quite rightly, "Are we never to know the real state of the case?" Of course we are.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Why not now?

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member for South Donegal has Koorn Spruit on the brain. I do not mind taking Koorn Spruit as an illustration of my argument. The hon. Member for South Donegal believes that the Secretary of State and myself have been in possession during the last few months of a mass of detailed information on everything that took place at Koorn Spruit. Although the War Office promised a despatch on the subject two months ago, no despatch arrived until about a week ago. The reason given for not sending the despatch earlier was that although a Report had been received from General Broadwood, Lord Roberts did not feel justified in commenting upon it until he had made personal inquiries into all the facts among the officers engaged.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Might I ask, then, how it comes to pass that in connection with the engagement at Koorn Spruit no fewer than four Victoria Crosses were advertised a fortnight ago, with all the details set out, if we know nothing about the despatch?

MR. WYNDHAM: It is a matter of universal practice to confer the rewards for individual acts of gallantry on the field on the immediate recommendation of officers. There can be no doubt about the gallantry of men who risk their lives to save the guns, when that act is witnessed by one hundred and fifty persons; but as to the action itself there may be the gravest doubt as to the apportionment of the blame, if blame has to be apportioned, between the general in chief command and the subordinate officers. The Commander-in-Chief was well advised after receiving General Broadwood's despatch in waiting for the opportunity to examine the officers commanding the regiments of cavalry and the battery of artillery. It does not follow that because Lord Roberts's despatch was received a week ago that this is the moment for publishing it to the House and to the world. I do not think it is. The despatches do not arrive in chronological order; and there is a great deal to be said against publishing the criticism of strategic and tactical operations in the field, while the officers concerned still retain the confidence of the Commander-in-Chief. Whether we are right or whether we are wrong, the Government do not propose to publish these despatches until the end of the war. ["Oh!"] At the end of the war there will be a full publication of all that bears upon these points which are of the greatest interest, and more particularly on the point that there have been very large surrenders on the part of our men. That is a question which must be most carefully and searchingly inquired into. No one feels that with greater conviction than the Government, the Commander-in-Chief, and the Adjutant-General; but that being so, how unfair would it not be to do anything which might prejudice the conclusions at which we should arrive? I do not think it will be found that our men have failed to show the stubbornness which characterised their forefathers; but whatever might be the result in the interests of the Army and the nation, the question should not be prejudged. The right hon. Baronet asked me pointedly whether there had not been a saving in connection with the Royal Reserve regiments which might be used as an appropriation in aid. There has not been any such saving, and the Reserves will cost all the money taken for them in the Estimates. I do not propose to reargue the question of the equipment of the Reserves. I have admitted that there have been hitches in supplying equipment and armament, but I have also said that these hitches have not been due to the fact that the equipment and armament were not obtainable, but to the fact that the applications had not been made at the proper time and to the proper quarter. It is a fact that in some of the military districts requests are not put forward with that promptitude and accuracy which are necessary, largely, because general officers commanding districts have been left so long without any responsibility and without the right to move a finger on their own behalf that the sense of responsibility and initiative is only coming to them somewhat slowly. In respect to one or two articles of equipment a portion of the delay has been due to the difficulty of getting supplies from the trade, but the greater part of it has been due to what I may call want of practice in the proper working of the powers conferred under the new system of decentralisation. I hope I have made that point clear to the Committee. The right hon. Baronet also asked a question as to what was being done in order to carry out the avowed intention of the Government with reference to making some provision for the widows of the men who have died in the war. That question is being worked out de die in diem, but it has not been possible to arrive at a solution or to frame a scheme in time for the present Estimate. The question will, however, be dealt with in the Estimate next year.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: The point I put was a specific point as to the shortness of horses at the present time in the Orange Colony.

MR. WYNDHAM: Now I recollect the right hon. Baronet's argument. It is not easy to carry all these arguments in one's mind. The right hon. Baronet's argument was an inference. He inferred from the disposition of the troops that had there been more remounts greater progress would have been made. I feel hardly justified in offering another set of hypotheses. All I know is that we have sent an enormous number of remounts to South Africa, and we have no reason to believe that we have not sent all the horses asked for. We have sent in all 111,000 remounts, including cavalry and mounted infantry horses. I see the Leader of the Opposition in his place.

He asked me some questions in reference to our policy of reserves of stores. I would be glad to enter into the matter at greater length more gallant friend the Member for, Great Yarmouth, and, indeed, I think it is a subject which well deserves the attention of the Committee. I will not argue again whether the War Office has been in fault in not putting this policy forward sooner, and I have shown it is not the outcome of this war, because it was commenced before the war. The policy is on all fours with the policy pursued in respect to the Navy—that is to say, a sum will be asked for in the Estimates next year as the first instalment of a total to be spread over three years, and when that sum is voted by a Committee of the House it will be held in respect to the Army as a sum is now held in respect to the Navy, and the Government and Parliament will be honourably pledged to the manufacturers of this country to continue the orders given to them on that basis. Having established that reserve by that means, the other part of the policy is that it should be automatically maintained at that level, and if that is done we will be in a better position than ever before if Imperial danger or emergency arises. If hon. Members who have not asked questions will bear with me, I will answer the hon. Members who have, although the answers may only be of interest to the particular hon. Members who put the questions. The hon. and gallant Gentleman for South-east Essex referred to what he called a policy of concealment, and also stated that the responsibility for the Koon Spruit affair must be a matter of common knowledge to the troops in South Africa. I submit to the Committee that the fact that Lord Roberts himself, as Commander-in-Chief, was not able until the other day to come to a conclusion and felt it necessary to take a considerable amount of evidence on the matter shows that there has been no policy of concealment. Then my hon. and gallant friend entered into a somewhat pessimistic analysis of the number of troops whom we may expect to return from South Africa, and I think he took an unduly gloomy view of the situation. We have in South Africa now 150,000 Regulars. Of course a certain number of them are in the Reserve, but they will all return. Then as to the force at home. We have almost 118,000 Regulars, 72,000 Militia, 8,000 Yeomanry, and 250,000 enrolled Volunteers. A good deal has been said in the course of the debate that the force at home is not a field force. In a sense, that is quite true; but did anyone expect that there would be a field force in this country when more than two army corps, a cavalry division, and troops for the lines of communication had been sent out? These are sometimes called admissions on the part of the Government. They are not admissions; they are statements of fact within the common knowledge of every Member of the House and of every man in the country who takes the slightest interest in military affairs. The fact is, we are approaching the standard of establishment which will enable us to send two army corps out of the country towards the end of a great naval struggle with a first-class Power. If we have sent that number of troops out of the country, it follows they do not remain in the country, and that the troops which are in the country are largely the machine which created that army, and which created and maintains the army in Egypt, India, and the Colonies. That machine is capable, stiffened as it is by the Royal Reserve—which for that purpose has been most valuable—of being moulded into a field force. On the question of the Army Medical Corps I think I have said all that need be said. Then my hon. and gallant friend the Member for Lincoln addressed a few questions to me. He asked me if the Volunteers and the Imperial Yeomanry would be allowed to go to their homes when invalided home. Yes, Sir, certainly. I may say that invalided soldiers come back automatically to hospital, and when they reach the convalescent stage they have the choice of either going into a convalescent home or returning to their own homes. A sum on account is given to a man in this position—not as a rule the whole of the arrears due to him, because it has been proved by experience that it is better to give a man £7 under such circumstances than to give him £15 or £20. The hon. Member for Wandsworth put a question on a subject which fills many of us with great concern, and which must command the marked sympathy of all. We know how many there are at present whose nearest and dearest relatives are in the sad situation of being prisoners in the hands of the Boers and the hon.

Member, not at all unnaturally under the circumstances, asked whether the Government were doing all in their power in the matter. Yes, Sir, I think the Government is doing all that lies in its power in order to get correspondence and comforts and clothing to these prisoners. The question is not a very easy one. The hon. Member asked me why the War Office did not co-operate with the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office. That has been the procedure which has been followed since the very outbreak of the war for this very purpose. At the outbreak of the war President Kruger—acting, of course, well within his rights, since diplomatic relations necessarily ceased—declined to permit any emissary of the Government to have access, direct or indirect, to any British prisoner in the hands of the Boers, although he allowed Mr. Hay, the representative of the United States, to act as an intermediary—a concession which he was not bound to make. He also laid down that if any Government assistance were sent to the aid of the prisoners the Government of the South African Republic would no longer allow private assistance to reach them. Largely, however, through the efforts of Mr. Hay a better understanding was arrived at, and the conditions were somewhat modified. Consul General Croal, at Lorenzo Marques, was also able to be of great assistance as an intermediary, but, for reasons not within his knowledge, the President of the South African Republic would no longer permit Mr. Croal to act in that capacity, and stated that he wished all representations in respect to the prisoners to reach him through Lord Roberts. That being the wish of President Kruger we have asked Lord Roberts to spare no effort to secure the object which the hon. Member and all of us have so much at heart. With regard to China and the expeditionary force of 11,000 men which we are sending there, I have already explained that the money taken in this Estimate is sufficient for the prime and recurring charges of such a force, and an equal sum has been provided in case the situation in the Far East should demand considerable reinforcements. As to the question of policy, that is not one on which I am prepared to embark.

MR. WARNER: The discussion has travelled over such very wide grounds that I do not think it would be wise to press my motion for a reduction as a protest against the mismanagement of the War Office. I should, however, have liked to receive an answer to my accusation against the transport system in South Africa. It would have been more satisfactory if the Under Secretary for War could have contradicted my charge. I gather from letters I have seen that the majority of the forces under Lord Roberts have for the last three months been on half rations and without pay. That, I think, is evidence of a serious breakdown. Transport difficulties have also been responsible for a great reduction of hospital accommodation, and apparently, through some serious, some criminal mistake, the whole transport has been miserably inadequate. That is the charge I have made, and I am sorry it has not been contradicted. I should have been glad to press my motion for a reduction if it could have been taken as applying to the negligence of War Office officials and the Government, but, as the debate has ranged over much wider grounds, I do not feel justified in pressing it, and I therefore ask leave to withdraw.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) wished to say a few words as to the treatment of prisoners by the Boers. He thought the information recently received would scarcely tend to reassure the relatives in this country of prisoners held by the Boers. The hon. Gentleman had told them that communications with respect to prisoners must pass through Lord Roberts, and, if the statement was true that Lord Roberts had turned thousands of Boer women and children out of Pretoria, and driven them into the field of battle, it was very much to be regretted. They had been unable to get any information from the Government on the point, but he ventured to assert that such a barbarous and inhuman practice was altogether outside the usages of civilised warfare, and he doubted very much if ever before such a thing had been done by a civilised people. No one could doubt Lord Roberts's courage, and no one had hitherto doubted his humanity, and he could only say that such conduct as this, if the charge were true, was the conduct of a panic-stricken soldier. The country ought to be reassured on this point, especially if we expected the Boers to extend decent treatment to the British troops they had captured. The Committee was now asked to vote a sum of eleven and a half millions. As to Members who had no expert knowledge of military affairs, it was impossible particularly as so much interest has been shown in it by my hon. and that they could pass any judgment on the details of the expenditure on Army organisation. But he, for one, did doubt very much whether we had got value for the money we had expended on our Army in past years. That expenditure for the past five years had ranged from seventeen to twenty millions annually, and the material result of the outlay was now concentrated in the Transvaal. Not only had we all our Army out there, but we had got in addition large numbers of Yeomanry and colonists. Let the Committee contrast the results of our own outlay with what we saw our opponents doing in the Transvaal, and then he thought it would be admitted that everybody concerned in Army administration in this country ought to hide their heads in shame. The Government were now asking for exactly double the sum which the Transvaal Government had spent on its army during the last five years. That expenditure was £80,000 in 1895, £495,000 in 1896, £386,000 in 1897, and in no year had it been over a million. But, taking the total at five millions, it sufficed to enable the burghers to collect sufficient war material to hold the entire British Army at bay for ten months—an Army on which we had spent a hundred millions in the same period. And in addition we had incurred a war expenditure of sixty millions. We had been told that the Transvaal Government was a corrupt oligarchy, which pocketed half the money voted for public purposes. Therefore, half the five millions must have gone into the pockets of President Kruger and his colleagues, and that made the contrast all the more striking. We ought to bring this war to a speedy conclusion, not so much on account of the Boers, but to spare England the humiliation she was suffering in the face of the whole world by reason of the lamentable position of affairs in South Africa. It was admitted that we had 220,000 troops out there, while the Boers had only about 20,000. We had drawn our supplies from every country in the world; and our fleets were bringing them across every ocean, whereas the Boers had only the armaments and food supplies they were enabled to collect before the war started, and had only had five millions to spend on them. Yet they were still holding us at bay; they had frequently out-generalled us, and had often defeated us. He thought that the best thing this country could do would be to endeavour to come to honourable terms of peace as soon as possible, and to engage some of the Boer generals, like de Wet, to re-organise our Army and endeavour to place it on a more satisfactory footing.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said that, although the debate commenced at half-past four, that was the first opportunity Irish Members had had of voicing the views of their constituents, among whom were to be found the relatives of Irish soldiers whose lives had been so mercilessly, so cruelly, and so wickedly sacrificed in this atrocious guinea-pig war. He would be the last man in the world to complain of the attitude of the Under Secretary for War, who discharged his duties in so able and often-time in so sympathetic a way, but he did complain of the difficulty experienced in getting clear answers to questions, some of which he had repeatedly asked during the last six months. The hon. Gentleman has been congratulated on his powers of splendid evasion. He believed the compliment was richly deserved. Splendid evasion has been the manner of the hon. Gentleman in answering the questions he had addressed to him. Splendid evasion! If he were less courteous he might describe it by another word. In order to show the hon. Gentleman that he was not afraid to speak what he could only insinuate through the medium of questions he would tell him what he meant in the plainest manner. He believed the War Office to be a hot-bed of favouritism, corruption, and pollution. He, that afternoon, asked the hon. Gentleman whether the command of the Royal Irish Rifles, which had been rendered vacant by the death of the gallant soldier who led his regiment at Stormberg and was fatally wounded, would be given to one of his Irish colleagues or to an Englishman. The hon. Gentleman would not tell him what it was proposed to do in the back parlour in Pall Mall against Irish soldiers. Was he justified when he said that it was an atrocious thing not to give the command to a compatriot of the officer who fell on the battle-field? This was the way that Irishmen in the field were treated. He wanted to put it plainly to the House. There was something to be said for passing over officers of the Royal Irish Rifles. They were Irishmen drawn from the small professional class. They were common fellows like himself, and they were passed over. He was justified in saying that the War Office system was one of corruption. The Irish Rifles were not the only persons who had something to complain of in connection with this unjust war. When the Inniskilling Fusiliers left Queenstown they were 1,145 strong, and he saw from the jingo prints that when the regiment turned up at Colenso, three weeks ago, there was only a remnant left. Two colonelcies became vacant, one by the death of Colonel Thackeray. Who received the rewards of valour in the field when these vacancies were filled? They were not Irishmen. The War Office was a sink of pollution. Now he came to another item. He was much obliged to the First Lord of the Treasury for not moving the closure. He was sure they would be pleased that he had something to say in favour of the right hon. Gentleman. The Under Secretary struggled in deep water about the Military Press censorship. The censor was a Whip of the Conservative Party, and so the office was well manipulated for political purposes. On the 6th March last Mr. Winston Churchill telegraphed from Natal that he had had an interview with Sir George White immediately after the relief of Ladysmith. That telegram was published in the Morning Post on 8th March. Sir George White said in that interview that he had been shamefully treated by the War Office; that he had been intrigued against by the War Office, and that he had been kept in his position by the most gallant Sir Redvers Buller. He asked the right hon. Gentleman about that telegram, and he assumed a mighty tone and would not answer. Sir George White had never denied that he used that observation, and Sir Redvers Buller had never stated that he did not protect Sir George White against the intrigue of the War Office. Was that the reason why Sir Redvers Buller was mentioned with censure in the Spion Kop despatches? These things were extremely interesting. He regarded Lord Lansdowne, the Secretary of State for War, as a gentleman who ought not to be entrusted with any public office. He would tell the Committee why. A gentleman who suggested to Sir Redvers Buller to re-write a despatch in order that the English public should get a garbled account of a transaction was unworthy of public confidence. As long as that gentleman occupied that position he did not consider that the life of any common soldier was in any degree in security. He believed that everything that was suppressed in the despatches was suppressed, not for strategic, but for political purposes. He supposed there was no man with a year's experience in the Army who did not believe in his heart and soul that Lord Methuen, the hero of Magersfontein, was a miracle of incompetency. The despatches that he first sent were never published. They were revised and edited in the War Office for public consumption. On 5th July the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, replying to the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth, said that many of the despatches in reference to the war would be published in a fortnight. Now they heard from the Under Secretary for War that the despatches were not to be published until the end of the war. That meant that they were not to be published before the General Election. The people were not to know how the campaign had been mismanaged. The Under Secretary had a kind of hankering after Koorn Spruit. Who was the officer guilty of the Koorn Spruit disaster? Their curiosity had been whetted by the Spion Kop despatches. The hon. Gentleman did not say it at the time, but it appeared that some great man had been involved in it. Who was the Koorn Spruit hero? Was not Lord Kitchener himself the Koorn Spruit hero? Why had Lord Kitchener's name been kept back? Why had not Colonel Long's despatch and his vindication of himself against the censure of Sir Redvers Buller not been published? It was scandalous that it had not been. On the first day of the engagement at Paardeberg there were 1,500 men disabled. It was the most disastrous day of the whole war. Lord Kitchener, and he alone, was in supreme command, and Lord Roberts' comments on Lord Kitchener had never been published. Lord Kitchener considered the lives of common soldiers just as an engine-driver considered the coal put into the furnace to be consumed in order to proceed a certain number of miles. As they were aware, medical officers protested against the insufficiency of ambulances, and wounded men had to travel down to the base hospital in Cape carts without springs. He felt he must apologise for pressing the hon. Gentleman for information on one matter. The hon. Gentleman was the last person in the world with whom he would like to quarrel; for he behaved in a manner of singular nobility to a political opponent some years ago when he was the subject of an abominable charge, and went into the box to support the evidence as to character. But would he not now do for Colonel Long, who was a gallant soldier, what he did for a political opponent in the Law Courts? Why had not Colonel Long's despatch been published? Would not Lord Lansdowne allow it? Sir Redvers Buller, in his despatch with reference to Colenso, censured Colonel Long, but said also he was too ill to give his own account. Well, Colonel Long had recovered, yet his account had never been published. On the previous day he gave the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord from memory an account of the various surrenders and captures of British troops by the Boers, from Nicholson's Nek down to Roodeval. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that some of the men so captured had been released, and were now actually engaged in hostilities. He was asked if before the men went back to duty an inquiry was held into the causes of their surrender or capture. He got no satisfactory reply, and he ventured to tell the right hon. Gentleman that if no inquiry had been held then there had been a gross violation of the Queen's Regulations. Was Lord Lansdowne, because he happened to be an Irish landlord, and a bad one, to be allowed to ride rough-shod over the Army Regulations? There was another instance he would like to inquire into. Just before Magersfontein a certain colonel refused to obey a command of Lord Methuen—"dashing; Methuen," as he was called. The ground of the refusal was that his horses were worn out and that the men had long been without food. That colonel Gough had never been court-martialled, lest it should compromise Methuen. What influence was there behind Methuen, whose policy had resulted in a sacrifice of 1,500 human lives, in addition to the maiming of 3,000 men? Why was he being kept in office? Again, General Sir William Butler was kept in office solely because he would then be unable, without a breach of military discipline, to disclose the nature of the despatches he sent home in September last, describing his fears as to the campaign, and prophesying the calamities that would come from it. The hon. Gentleman, no doubt, had shown delightful optimism throughout. In order to qualify for his office he was for some months a sub-lieutenant in a domestic regiment. He also went out to the Egyptian War and behaved very gallantly; but he must say he could not understand how anyone who had seen and realised what war was could talk so lightly, he had almost said so unfeelingly, of the miseries and trials of the men, and the tortures and agonies of their relatives at home. It was all owing to his hero-worship of Cecil Rhodes. It was hateful to any man of sensibility that the lives and fortunes of our gallant fellows should be treated as mere pawns on the chess-board in the hands of incompetent and corrupt officials of the War Office, and that this should be done in the interests of society, and not of the people. He remembered the delight shown in Radical circles when abolition of purchase in the Army was brought about, but he failed to see that the good anticipated had resulted, and he grieved to know that the lives of his fellow-countrymen had been sacrificed by the disastrous incompetence of an abominable, corrupt, and belated War Office.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that when a Vote was brought forward to increase the sum granted for war expenditure to sixty-one millions, it was time that the Irish Members—the representatives of a people and of a poor country wholly opposed to the war—should, even at that late hour, raise their voices in protest. The attitude of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in regard to the sacrifices involved in this war took his mind back to the days of Nero and Caligula. He could well imagine Nero in his palace, before ordering the wild beasts to be set free to spring upon the Christians, saying, in reply to some remonstrance which might have been addressed to him by one of his Ministers, "What does it matter about the suffering of the people?" This was a question whether Paganism or Christianity was right; and we now had the Paganism of the twentieth century delivered by the Oracle at Birmingham. The Irish Members were asked that night to give their votes in favour of the continuance of a war founded upon most debased principles, and to vote for the war, although it had been proved that their countrymen had been among the bravest and the best. Let it not be supposed that in the protest they were offering they were insensible to the part which Irishmen had borne in the war. They regretted that the places of those who had fallen were not taken by comrades of their own blood, and that the promotion should be snatched by strangers. They also regretted that gallant soldiers—and this was a matter that must occupy a prominent place in the minds of Irishmen—who found themselves for a moment under a cloud had been hustled home and had not received the justice to which they were entitled under military law. Men who bore the scars of conflict, men in the position of Colonel Gough, had been driven into silence, while men who ordered the massacre of soldiers were allowed to remain in command. He did not blame the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War. He passed no comment on his conduct. He knew that no man could sympathise more than the hon. Gentleman with a gallant soldier, whether private or commander. Before he took the position to which he had been elevated he had known what it was to have a soldier's portion. Nor would he offer any criticism upon Lord Lansdowne. The noble Lord was an Irish landlord, and it might be supposed that in his criticism he might be influenced by the hostility that prevailed towards him. For his part he would never sever himself from any Irishman, whether Protestant or Catholic, Liberal or Tory. He was for Irishmen, and he said that no man who had the suggestion or shadow of disgrace placed upon his name should have been denied justice. They awaited justification. Fancy a man in the position of a commander of cavalry, having won his spurs on a hundred fields, being placed upon half-pay by the British Government, and denied the trial to which he would have been entitled if he had committed the lowest fraud known to a pawnshop. Where was the justification for this? He passed no criticism on Lord Methuen or Lord Roberts. He was not able to do so. He had not sufficient knowledge of military tactics, never having been with a squadron in the field, to say where the blame lay in these matters. He had read in The Times of the previous day a letter, signed "A," about the treatment of the Irish regiments at a place called Lindley. The writer said that his son was in that engagement. "A" was the initial of Lord Ashbourne, and that noble Lord had a son in an Irish Yeomanry regiment. That Irish regiment, consisting of 800 gallant young men, on reaching Lindley found the place in the possession of the Boers. They held out for four days, being obliged to live on one spoonful of jam and two cups of coffee in the twenty-four hours, and in the end, when their ammunition gave out, they were obliged, after the loss of seventy five or eighty men killed, to submit to the last resort of brave men—surrender. This writer in The Times asked why it was that on board one of Her Majesty's ships the smallest matters were made the subject of court-martial, while in regard to matters of Army discipline high placed officials were simply ordered to return to their homes? He did not know. Whatever their political views might be, they were entitled to ask for executive justice, and, if necessary, for punitive justice in regard to all these matters. Let it not be supposed that, however much Irish Members were opposed to the war, their hearts did not thrill either with the defeat or victory of their fellow-countrymen. Much as he deplored the miseries of the war, much as he hated the very name of annexation, the conduct of the Irish regiments in the British service was as much a portion of the fame and glory of the Irish race as if they fought in the service of Ireland herself. Were all these matters to be passed over? He did not blame the Government when he came to the smaller matters of detail. Whether a wounded soldier had a blanket, or a waterproof sheet, or no sheet at all, was a matter that might be accounted for. If there was no doctor or stretcher-bearer at the moment, he was quite aware that there might be an explanation of their absence. But when they got an offender home in the cool of Pall Mall, a man under a cloud, why was his conduct not to be investigated? That was his presentation of the demand, and upon that matter he would say no more. He did not believe but that there might be exceptions, but, taking Ministers in the mass, they had no desire to turn this war to the benefit of the election. He believed if they took English Ministers for generations they would find that there was a tradition which descended to them and prevented them from availing themselves of the mere stratagems of war for Party purposes. He passed from that and he came to the charge which fell upon Ireland in consequence of this Vote. He protested against it, firstly, as a charge which they should never have been called upon to bear, and secondly, as a charge out of which Great Britain had all the profit and Ireland all the loss. He would not go minutely into this question, but he thought it would be a profound stigma on the Irish name if they did not, when opportunity arose, offer some word of protest on this subject. Ireland could have no gain, no advantage, or honour from this war. We had spent £62,000,000. Where had the money gone? To every nation in Europe, to almost every nation under heaven. They had all gained some little thing out of this war, except Ireland. We had gone to Bohemia, Chicago, Germany, Austria, France and Italy, and we had even gone to Spain, but from the nation from which our most gallant soldiers were drawn we had bought an occasional horse when we could not buy one elsewhere. Outside of that, not a sixpence had been spent in Ireland. What was the inference to be drawn from these facts? Khaki tunics and cartridges could not be ordered, for some paltry excuse, and although Ireland was linked to this country it was not to be allowed to supply any of the goods for the purchase of which it was so heavily taxed. The Moors were linked with Spain for 700 years, but were put out in the end, and in a similar way the union between Great Britain and Ireland would be terminated unless the former changed her policy in these matters. They had been told that night that it would be necessary to maintain a garrison in South Africa for some years of 40,000 men.

MR. WYNDHAM: 30,000.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, 30,000 men would, in future, have to be maintained in the Transvaal. Ireland would have to pay a proportion of the cost of that. They would have to pay for horses and provender, and for worsted stockings and khaki jackets for the use of men nurtured at the breasts of Irish mothers; but what were they to get out of it? If the war was a commercial investment what would be Ireland's share? The idea of a tax on the mines had been repudiated. The Government had now to take their orders from the mining classes. When the war broke out we were told there was something like a thousand millions of gold in the Transvaal. Two and a half per cent. on that would largely help to pay the cost of the war, but the Jews rose up and forbade that, so the people of this country were to be made to pay. Was Ireland to gain any advantage from this war? If not why should she be asked to pay any share of the cost? She had already paid dearly with blood. Ireland was involved in an unhappy partnership, and he wanted to see her put in the position of Jersey and Guernsey—allowed to grow her own crops and to have her own Parliament. Great Britain recruited her Army in Ireland and extracted out of the necessities of the people a heavy contribution of flesh and blood. Why not be content with that, and refrain from imposing this horrible war tax upon them? He begged to move to reduce the Vote by eight millions.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a reduced sum, not exceeding £3,500,000, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.) said he wished to join in resisting the Vote for war expenditure. Irish Members had been consistent throughout in their opposition to the war—they had continually protested against it; and bearing in mind that ten months had elapsed without any substantial success having been gained by our troops, he thought it would be admitted that the Irish Members were right and that the Government were wrong. The Irish had special claims to resist this unjust and iniquitous war. They were taxed out of all proportion to what was their fair share, and yet they were being asked to vote money for gratuitous to the troops engaged in that miserable strife. What value were they to get in return? Irish money had helped to pay for the training of the officers, but what credit had they proved to this nation from a military point of view? Under the present system the great object of our military training was to see that the men's hair was properly cut, and that the cook-houses were kept clear. A couple of years of that work was sufficient to turn any officer into a prig of the first water, and it was not to be wondered at, therefore, that there had been so many disgraceful surrenders of large bodies of our men to bodies of Boers inferior both in numbers and in arms. At one place, after ten men had been killed, 500 officers and men surrendered; at another, after three officers had been killed, another 500 officers and men surrendered, and at a third, after seven had been killed, eighteen officers and 400 men surrendered. And then when our troops did gain a victory they utilised their triumph for the purpose of wreaking merciless vengeance on the unfortunate inhabitants of the district, and he had seen heartrending descriptions of the manner in which our troops had treated the inhabitants of the two Boer Republics. He supposed that some of the money voted by Parliament would be paid as gratuities to officers—the men responsible for waging war on helpless women and children and the burning and looting of houses in the manner described by English correspondents whose letters had been quoted. We talked about Chinese horrors, and the savagery of the "Boxers," yet he thought the troops of this Christian nation were committing acts in the Transvaal which were equal to anything that had been done by those wretched fiends the Boxers in Peking. Half the money they were asked to vote that night was to suppress the Boxers. If there was such a thing as equal law and justice, instead of voting money to suppress the Chinese marauders they would be voting money to suppress the outrages in South Africa. He protested against any money being voted for the continuance of such infamous proceedings.
